Which comes first —
Your second helping?
or our second front?

You want to see this war won — and won quickly. You want to see it carried to the enemy with a vengeance. Okay—so do all of us. But just remember...

A second front takes food... food to feed our allies in addition to our own men.

Which do you want — more meat for you, or enough meat for them? An extra cup of coffee on your breakfast table, or a full tin cup of coffee for a fighting soldier?

Just remember that the meat you don't get—and the coffee and sugar that you don't get—are up at the front lines—fighting for you.

Would you have it otherwise?

Cheerfully co-operating with rationing is one way we can help to win this war. But there are scores of others. Many of them are described in a new free booklet called "You and the War," available from this magazine. Send for your copy today! Learn about the many opportunities for doing an important service to your country.

OUR WRITERS

Natalie Visart, who wrote about the Fred MacMurrays on page 36, says,

"I design for bread and butter and write for fun and jam. I was born in Chicago—was toddling around Europe with my parents when the first World War broke out, and we were arrested by mistake for being German spies. I think I must have made a devastating Mata Hari at that age.

"I grew up in Hollywood where I had been sent for my health. My classmates were mostly daughters of motion picture people, and inevitably I grew up movie minded.

"I became a designer on Cecil B. deMille's "Cleopatra," and have clothed all of his epics ever since. Am now under contract to Hunt Stromberg Productions.

"Went to Europe with Lilly Dache for the openings in '38 and on my way back stopped in New York and sold my first article to Collier's. This stroke of luck promptly went to my pencil, and when I wasn't drawing guimpes and gussets, I was writing articles which I've been fortunate enough to have sold to Charm, Glamour, and Fawcett publications.

"This brings us up to date. I am now doing the costumes for "The Story of Dr. Wassell," Mr. deMille having borrowed me from Mr. Stromberg—and driving Miss Waterbury quietly mad by not finishing my next assignment for her."

ABOVE SUSPICION

Newlyweds Frances and Richard Myles are approached by a friend in the British Foreign Office during the late summer of 1939, who asks them to make their European honeymoon a spy-hunting expedition. The idea is that they will, as devoted lovers, be above suspicion. Their task is to discover where a certain important Englishman has been hidden by the Nazis. Their only guides are the tune, "My Love is Like a Red, Red Rose," and roses themselves, which are worn on the person.

Fred MacMurray and Joan Crawford are very amusing and dramatic in a series of scarey adventures. You'll enjoy this and them.

CONEY ISLAND

Starring Betty Grable, George Montgomery, and Cesar Romero, magnificently photographed in color, the only thing that keeps this from being knock-out is standard musical plot No. 1.

It's the oldie about the two double-crossing pals, Montgomery and Romero, in the Coney Island days at the turn of the century, and how they get even with one another.

Cesar Romero, who has once cheated George by way of a poker deck that had nine aces, has set himself up with the most popular saloon and show on the island. George walks in to collect, sees Betty, who is not only Cesar's star but his secret heart.

George decides to walk off with the works. He sets up a rival stand, teaches Betty how to look and sing like a lady, is all set to marry her when Cesar does a bit of dirty work.

Betty has never looked more luscious or sung more seductively. The dances are really a dish. You'll have fun.

FIVE GRAVES TO CAIRO

If you can accept the idea that Franchot Tone, single handed, could outwit Gen. Erwin Rommel, then the suspense, vivid action, and romance of this will charm you.

Tone is the sole survivor of a British tank outfit, who staggers into an African desert town, only to find his comrades gone, the Germans once more in possession. In the outpost's only hotel, he meets a bitter young French girl, a bewildered Egyptian, captured English officers, and Rommel himself. The way he outwits the Nazis, frees the English, captures the girl's heart, learns Rommel's most treasured secret—that of the "five graves"—and eventually escapes is all keen adventure. Anne Baxter is very appealing as the girl.

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

by Ruth Waterbury

HE CALLED IT "MANHUNT MAZIE"

Robert Halff, the writer of "Swing Shift Maisie" which stars Ann Sothern, tells this one on himself.

He was asked to work out another "Maisie" plot, but requested to see whether he couldn't make it quite different from any "Maisie" that had gone before.

Bob fell to with a will and good cheer. He worked out a dilly which he called "Manhunt Maisie," and he considered that it was not only a truer characterization of a girl like Maisie, but also a finer, deeper characterization for Ann Sothern. With his noble heart beating high he took the script to the front office.

Said front office called him. "This is fine," said the big shot, who had just read the script. "You've really got something here."

Bob felt his chest inflating with pride. He suddenly realized he was a great artist, that he understood people.

"We're giving the script to Red Skelton," said the big shot. "It's a pip of a characterization for him."

IMAGINE—OF ALL THINGS!

Funny the things that one will try to save in an emergency. Joan Bennett personally saved two dozen handkerchiefs when her beautiful house burned down recently. In her flurry and hurry to get out of the burning house she knew she had to save something, blindly opened a top drawer in her dressing room, scooped up the contents, and it wasn't until she was outside that she discovered she was well supplied with hankies.

The loss represented two hundred thousand dollars in actual money and almost twice that in sentimental value. Joan had built the house from her own earnings before she married producer Walter Wanger. She lived there with her two daughters, one the child of her first marriage to John Fox, Jr., the other the daughter of her marriage to Gene Markey, and there she expected to have her third child, born recently. She was, in fact, but one month from motherhood at the time of the fire, and she and Walter, both praying for a son, were desperately worried.

Almost all the beautiful furniture was lost, plus Walter's own fine library of first editions. Nothing was left of the house except the outside brick walls. Priorities will keep it from being rebuilt until after the war, and there isn't a livable house in all Hollywood that is vacant these days. The Wangers, with the two young daughters, and the new baby are all now living in a hotel. None of them like it in the least.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE CROSBYS?

Most nervous person, except for Joan and Walter, at the Bennett fire was Bing Crosby. You know about the Crosby home at Toluca Lake burning recently, but what you don't know is that exactly one week before Joan's fire, Bing and his tribe had moved just two doors away from the Bennett house.

The Crosbys began to think they were being haunted by the Cat People or Dracula or something when the blaze started, but luckily not so much as one spark fell their way.

Will you look at this! After all that Flynn stuff, if our Annie Sheridan isn't being seen everywhere about town—at the time of this shot it was at Slapsie Maxie's—with Cully Richards. What's slaying Hollywood is that Cully looks enough like Eddie Norris, Ann's first husband, to be his brother!

Errol Flynn has a new girl friend, too. They are seen together constantly, but Errol refuses to let the camera boys get close to her. We've heard her name is Nora Eddington, although Errol just calls her "Beautiful."

That broken heart healer of Hollywood, Cesar Romero, is dancing about these evenings with Phyllis Brooks, and they do insist this looks more serious than any of Cesar's dates for years and more serious than any Brooksie has gone for since Cary Grant.

LETTER FROM A BOY IN THE SERVICE!...

$10.00 LETTER

Dear Miss Waterbury:

When I say I went to school with Melvyn Douglas, quizzical eyebrows do nip-ups. Yet, it's the truth for I have recently completed a special course at Branch No. 8, Army Administration School, Washington & Jefferson College, Washington, Pa., where Private Melvyn Douglas was a fellow student.

In all sincerity, Hollywood should be proud of Pvt. Douglas. His task was not an easy one. His every move could easily have been misinterpreted. He did not curry favors nor did he shirk his regular details, such as pitching in and taking his turn at broom and mop for room cleanup. Any time there was a call for volunteers he was the first to step forward regardless of the task. Came evening, he put in his time studying and preparing the following day's work. Perhaps an hour or so before "bed-check" he would step out for a breath of fresh air and hop to the corner store for a soda. Starry-eyed girls sitting alongside of him at the fountain were agog. Occasionally, one of the good burghers of the town, completely unaware of his identity, would engage him in general conversation, just as they do with most soldier-students in town, and Douglas would respond just as if he were chatting with old friends.

I could go on and on, but it would all be in a laudatory vein. And I'm not writing this merely for the sake of the contest. It's just that an injustice, I'm certain, was done Pvt. Douglas some time ago when Washington cynics, politicos, and what have you, raised hob with his sincere efforts while with the Office of Civilian Defense, causing him to resign.

SKY-ROCKET

The most spectacular male rise to stardom in the past five years is that of Alan Ladd, now Private Ladd of the air forces. After kicking around in small roles, in radio bits, he was discovered by Sue Carol, the agent, who is now Mrs. Ladd. Susie, who had once been a star herself, recognized the talents no casting director had yet had sense enough to see. She negotiated Alan's Paramount contract, carries on his fan mail now, will oversee his career when he is able to come back to it, and in the meantime has brought into the world young Alana Ladd, a very tiny girl whom Alan adores. "China," now released, is so successful that other studios are releasing old, old films in which Alan briefly appeared. And this, friends, is one of the truest signs of clicking in Hollywood. Incidentally this success couldn't happen to a nicer guy.

At Home with
INGRID BERGMAN

This is Pia, who has her mother's coloring but her daddy's features. Pia doesn't quite understand about her mama being a movie star—and cares less. What she loves is climbing . . . everything and anything in sight.

Bergman, herself, lists her role in "Casablanca" as her favorite to date.

On screen, she is the most rapidly rising of feminine stars. Off screen, she is a devoted girl-mother

THE most discussed star in Hollywood today lives very modestly in a furnished apartment in Beverly Hills. It is a menage of three: Mrs. Peter Lindstrom, Pia Lindstrom, her four-year-old daughter, and Maybelle, an intelligent, well educated Negro girl, who, having graduated in nursing and done secretarial work, plays mother, nurse, and worrier-in-chief.

The world at large knows Mrs. Lindstrom as Ingrid Bergman, star of the enormously successful "Casablanca," co-star of a very dreary revival of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," the compelling beauty of "Rage in Heaven," "Adam Had Four Sons," and "Intermezzo," and soon to be Maria of "For Whom The Bell Tolls" and Clio of "Saratoga Trunk." But outside of her name, the world knows little else about her. Because she is a girl of simple feelings and of a modesty most unusual in an actress, she has given out few interviews. Her life, her past, the manner in which she has skyrocketed to fame, has been something of a closed book. Let me open just a part of that book for you.

No story of Ingrid Bergman has any meaning unless it tells of Dr. Lindstrom and the love that lies between these two young people.

It was one of the most thrilling moments in Bergman's life when the telephone rang late one night recently and Peter Lindstrom informed his actress wife that he was now a full-fledged doctor. He still has one year to serve on his interneship at the Strong Memorial Hospital in Rochester, New York, but after that his future and Ingrid's will be discussed by them. But not now, when his work at the hospital demands every minute of every hour of every day in the operating room and in study.

Very tall, very thin, and wearing glasses, prone to pace up and down the tiniest space lost in thought, young Dr. Lindstrom is a firm favorite at the hospital. His associates say he has the makings of a really great surgeon. Ingrid, between pictures, hurries to her husband, and is more interested in hearing of his medical experiments than telling him of her Hollywood experiences.

There has always been close harmony between Ingrid Bergman, the actress, and Peter Lindstrom, the medical student. He has always taken an absorbing interest in her career, advising her, guiding her in her decisions, as well as handling all the business details. Dr. Lindstrom is really his wife's business manager, even to handling the smallest matters, such as writing out the checks for the help's salaries.

Away from her husband Bergman leads a secluded and sheltered life. She gets up at dawn and returns home when it is dark. What little time is left goes into rest, reading, and study.

Sundays, however, are reserved for Pia. If there's a circus in town, they have a gala day, complete with peanuts, popcorn, and pop. Otherwise they go to see a Disney movie. "Bambi" is still Pia's favorite. Pia only dimly realizes that her mother works in pictures.

Someone once said to her, "And where's your mother today, Pia?" The little girl smiled. "I think she's at the studio making 'Bambi.' " she answered.

The Ingrid Bergman of Sweden and yesterday, and the Ingrid Bergman of Hollywood today does not care a great deal about clothes. Her wardrobe consists mostly of slacks and very few accessories. Evening dresses mean little to her, and she has only a few. She allows herself one luxury, however. That is stockings. She has, and may the rest of the feminine world weep, a drawer full of nylons.

There is no doubt that when it comes to clothes, Pia is much better dressed. Nearly always she is attired in new, cute peasant-like affairs created by Lanz. However, recently when Maybelle suggested that Pia was running short on things, Miss Bergman announced she had several things of her own that might be cut down for the little girl.

Pia, who goes to nursery school carrying her luncheon in a basket every morning, is very beautiful. She is very much like her mother, with the same coloring of hair and eyes. Her one love in life is climbing anything and everything. Whenever Pia disappears from view, she is never sought on the ground. She is always found somewhere in a tree, or at the top of the chain holding a swing in place, or on the handbars and rings that older and stronger children are afraid to tackle.

She takes after her mother in this athletic interest, for Ingrid Bergman is very much the outdoor girl. Although in Hollywood she has not had very much opportunity for the kind of exercise that she did in Sweden, she still, however, finds time for walks, swimming, and tennis. She plays a very good game of tennis, beating many a good man.

Ingrid does not want Pia brought

up as the little girl of a screen star. She knows only too well the artificial importance a child thus assumes in the eyes of the other children and their parents. So Pia at school is known as the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Lindstrom.

Because of this protection there was an amusing incident the other day. Pia saw some pictures of her mother in the arms of one Gary Cooper, who was embracing her with vigor and consummate artistry. Said Pia, "Who is that?"

"A friend," said Ingrid Bergman, unthinkingly. Then realizing that Pia might be curious as to why she should be kissing a friend, she said quickly, "It's your daddy, dear."

Pia's look went quickly to the picture of her father in the bedroom and back to Gary's photograph. The two men looked totally unlike. Pia was a puzzled little girl. Her mother instantly vowed that she would not bring home any more stills.

Ingrid Bergman is at her happiest when she reigns in the spotless kitchen of their small home. If Maybelle is not around, she is in her element, and settles down to concocting wonderful Swedish dishes, from a plentiful and varied supply to smorgasbord to Swedish pancakes with real strawberry jam. She rarely eats any of this, being a sparse eater who has only coffee and toast for breakfast. But she loves cooking and serving such food to her guests.

Recently I asked one of Bergman's closest friends why she was so unlike many of the stars. I realized, of course, that it was characteristic of the Swedish to be thrifty, and live and dress simply. But surely there was a limit to those inherent qualities. This friend said, "Ingrid entertains very little. She never spends money lavishly on her clothes, or her home, because her early life was one of struggle and deprivation."

This friend then told me that, after her mother died, Ingrid lived with her father. He was a very great and talented painter but not a commercially successful one. Everything struck him as being beautiful. He found no ugliness in the things he saw, and consequently his art was a permanent expression of beauty and loveliness and of a strange serenity that was recognized by only a few.

When her father died, Ingrid Bergman lived with one relative after another. She never had the things a young girl should have. Life, for her, was constantly in the raw, obstacles were frightening, and every step of accomplishment and advancement was the result of terrible effort.

"It is a wonder," said this friend, "that Ingrid was able to attain her present prominence. Nothing was in her favor. She had no rich friends, no political allies, no powerful angel to show her the way. She succeeded because of sheer, unbreakable faith in herself and a supreme trust that from hard work despite adversity and one disappointment after another, would come eventual recognition and glory."

From these early struggles came Bergman's knowledge of the value of money. You may be quite sure that she will make good use of the profits of her Hollywood career. Dr. Lindstrom would rather practice in his beloved Sweden than anywhere else, and Ingrid would rather be Sweden's first lady of the theater than the greatest actress in Hollywood.

It has always been Bergman's all-consuming ambition to have her own theater in Stockholm, not only to appear in the plays she dreams of, but also to be able to give those opportunities to other young actresses that she had to create for herself.

The other night Ingrid Bergman arrived at her small but tastefully decorated apartment in tears. Maybelle became frightened. She hadn't, in all the years she had worked for her, seen her beloved mistress look so pale and unhappy.

Ingrid said, "I've just seen 'For Whom the Bell Tolls.' It's such a sweet, beautiful story that I cried all through the picture. And now I can't stop."

And there you have a glimpse of the real Ingrid Bergman. Instead of remembering that she was the proud recipient of a copy of Ernest Hemingway's book in which the author had inscribed, "To Ingrid, the real Maria of 'For Whom the Bell Tolls.'" she was overcome by the picture itself. She had to have Maybelle put her to bed that night with a cup of warm tea and several aspirin.

Chief tribute for the discovery of the famous young Swedish star should go to one Katharine Brown, story editor and talent scout for David Selznick. It was she who brought to his attention a great Swedish picture, "A Woman's Face," in which Ingrid Bergman played the lead.

David Selznick immediately saw the possibilities of Miss Bergman in American-made pictures. He quickly sent Katharine Brown abroad. Miss Brown went to Stockholm, signed the great Bergman, but came back alone. Ingrid Bergman, even after signing, was not exactly enamoured at the idea of coming to these shores. Such an excursion, she imagined, might put an almost insurmountable gap between her picture work in Sweden and her wish to become a really great stage actress. So she kept putting off the trip.

Thus one night in Katharine Brown's apartment in New York, when they had almost forgotten the existence of this Swedish girl, the bell rang. Maybelle, then working for Miss Brown, went to answer it. "It was Miss Bergman. She couldn't say more than two dozen words of English," recalls Maybelle. "But she was so beautiful, her head and neck held high like a swan's that—well, I just opened my arms to her.

"I fell in love with her right there and then. And I guess she liked me because when Pia followed over, she asked me whether I would come to take care of them. She said they needed me. And so I did. I felt that it was I who needed them!"

For Maybelle it has been a wonderful experience, working for Ingrid Bergman. "She is the most considerate and kind person I have ever known," she says. "She is always wanting to do things for people, and from the very first she has made me feel that I was one of the family."

When Maybelle had a serious operation back in Rochester, it was Dr. Lindstrom who paid for all her medical care as well as the operation itself. Furthermore, he was so anxious for her welfare, he stayed in the operating room throughout the delicate surgery, lending his friendship and advice. It was Dr. Lindstrom, too, who saw to it that she was given an important insurance policy so that, in later years, Maybelle will have no worries.

"Casablanca" is Bergman's favorite picture. However, according to all advance reports, "For Whom the Bell Tolls" will supersede it in her affections. But no matter how successful her motion picture engagements may be, this star has promised herself that she will never neglect the stage.

In Hollywood, Bergman has been accused of not making friends easily. It should be said now that such an accusation is both false and unfair. She is by nature very definitely shy, and although she is fast becoming proficient at the American language, she is not always at ease with it. She often feels that she does not always say what she wants to say, and consequently she might offend people. So her ravishing smile more often than not has to make do for the words that she hesitates to say.

In the meantime, Ingrid Bergman is waiting for the war to end, is waiting for that glorious moment when she can return to her beloved country.

In Stockholm the blooms of the white and mauve lilac trees smell sweetly in the night, and high above the skerries the stars shine brightly. There is music, too, and the gay laughter of the sauntering crowds, and the voices of the children on the swings in the park.

Only Pia is silent, Pia who has found a flagpole with a height beyond her wildest hopes. She, too, in her fashion, is hitching a wagon to a star.

NEWS PICTURE OF THE MONTH or Love Conquers All

When she finished "The Girls He Left Behind," Alice Faye quit the screen. Twentieth Century-Fox begged, cajoled, threatened, but Alice refused to make another picture.

The cause of it all is that beautiful hunk of personality here shown on husband Phil Harris' arm—that and love. The personality is Miss Alice Faye Harris, Jr., now approaching her eighteen months' birthday.

Alice, Sr. is giving up her career, she says, because she loves her home, her husband, and Alice, Jr. a thousand times more than she loves the stardom, the fame, the wealth, and the good roles in Hollywood, all tossed in together. She wants to be a wonderful mother to Alice, Jr. and she wants Junior not to be an only child.

In quitting at the top, Alice Faye does something no other screen star has ever had the courage or wisdom to do. Interestingly enough, "Hello, Frisco, Hello," her first picture after motherhood, is the most successful picture in which she has ever appeared—and also registers her finest performance and her greatest beauty, both of voice and person.

Yet all through the making of that film, all through the shooting of "The Girls He Left Behind," Alice was restless. "I want to be home," she said. "This make-believe is silly when you've found out what real living is."

Smart Alice, still in her twenties, has saved her money. Phil Harris, past service age and honorably discharged from the Coast Guard, makes plenty from his band and his radio work.

Miss Alice, Jr. thus becomes one of the luckiest little girls in this world.

And, for onc[illegible] Hollywood love story is even greater than it was proclaimed to be.

HOLLYWOOD'S FIRST WAR TRIANGLE

PROVING THAT EVEN GLAMOUR GIRLS HAVE TO COPE WITH THE PROBLEM GIRLS ALL OVER THE COUNTRY ARE FACING—THE PROBLEM OF "SHOULD I DATE WHILE HE IS GONE?"

Vic Mature

IT was bound to happen sooner or later and, as usual, it was bound to happen most conspicuously in Hollywood where the spotlight plays the brightest. I mean, the triangle of The Boy Who Went To War—The Girl He Left Behind—and The Other Fellow.

It is not a [illegible]tory, and it applies as potently in Oshkosh as in Hollywood. It crops up in all those letters to the heart "experts" in the newspapers, beginning: "Dear Beatrice: Should I date while HE is gone? He knows I love no one else. But it gets so lonely. Please help—Bewildered." It doesn't seem so important when it is just Bewildered wrestling with the love-war problem.

But when the girl's name happens to be Rita Hayworth, and the man's name happens to be Victor Mature, and the other fellow's name just happens to be Orson Welles—that is, indeed, something else again.

Hollywood's first war triangle

by JOHN ALDERSON

Rita Hayworth

began to assume proportions when Rita recently admitted that she and Vic had postponed their marriage plans because of a "misunderstanding." She followed it up with a plea that sounded like all the Bewildereds in the world: Yes, Rita admitted, she and Vic had had a terrible battle via the long distance telephone.

"But I love him—he should know that," she protested. "There isn't anyone else, and he knows it. But it has been so lonely, so very lonely. When he first went away, I stayed home all the time. So many months went by. Everything seems more difficult when you are by yourself. You think so much. Finally, I thought it would be best to get out, to mix with people and try not to remember how lonely I was. Orson Welles is just a friend. Can't Vic understand that?"

Three thousand miles away in New York, Coast Guardsman Vic Mature apparently could not understand. On a brief leave (it was merely a few days) before returning to active duty in the North Atlantic, he told all and sundry within ear shot at the Stork Club, "It's all over. Rita and I are through."

In Hollywood, the Mercurian Mr. Orson Welles, recently tabbed 4-F by a draft board that had previously quoted him at 1-B, said absolutely nothing.

The trouble with this situation—and it is the same trouble with Tom, Dick, and Bewildered just as it is with Vic, Rita, and Orson—is that it is so hard to settle on the Hero, the Heroine, or the Villain.

At first glance it looks easy. Vic, of course, lines up as the injured hero, Rita as the victim-of-circumstances heroine, and looming in the background, as the potential heavy, is Genius Welles. It would be nice if it were all as simple as that. Unfortunately, it is not!

There's no doubt but that when the war came along, Vic and Rita were madly in love. There's no doubt that they planned to get married as soon as Vic's divorce from Martha Kemp Mature was Reno-ized. When Vic left the proximity of San Pedro, Calif. (at least proximity to Rita) for an Eastern base, the lovelorn Rita followed him to New York to say a tearful farewell and to admit to close friends that they would be married as soon as possible, courtesy of Martha and of Vic's first leave from Uncle Sam.

The Hayworth-Mature romance up until that time was a love story that had stirred up violent reactions among strangers and friends. Some were for it. "Sure," they said, "Vic has loved a lot of girls and broken a lot of hearts. But he is really in love with Rita. It is the real thing this time." So said the pros.

The cons held reservations: "She's riding for another heartache," they said. "It's too bad. With all the fame and glamour Hollywood has given her, Rita has never been a lucky kid with the men in her life. The Ed Judson marriage and divorce nearly tore her to ribbons. Vic's a good guy—but there have been so many women."

Rita heard these things—and they made her stubborn. They made her particularly stubborn when her studio, Columbia, hinted that it did not approve her romance.

It is unfortunate that a raft of professional troubles broke out for Rita just about the time Vic sailed away. That is where the unexpected, the unplanned things crop up.

For four months Rita was on suspension from Columbia—some say because of her refusal to star in "My Client, Curly." Others say it was a disciplinary measure because of her romance with Vic. The studio right from the first told all and sundry it did not want her to marry. Whatever was the real cause—the result was that Rita, who would have been far happier working and occupying herself from day to day, was left with four months of idleness on her hands.

For two or three months she went nowhere.

Of course, there was plenty of advice. By crawling into a hole, her friends said, she was making the mistake of her career. She no longer had a big studio back of her, plugging her pictures, seeing that she was kept continually before the public.

And always it was being drummed into Rita: Hollywood is a tough town. It is easy to be forgotten. Remember, she had come up the hard w[illegible] he had fought for every break she had. And now with Victory in sight—was she going to throw it over by mooning and keeping to herself?

And right here is where Orson Welles comes into the picture. And it must be said, in the light of cold facts, that Mr. Welles comes into the picture almost by remote control.

Sidney Skolsky, the well known movie columnist, in a tour of the studios, had happened to bump into Welles one day and put a typical columnist question to him: Who, among the Hollywood girls he did not know, would he most like to know? And so help us, if Orson doesn't reply, just like any other movie fan might, mulling over such a question—"Rita Hayworth."

Now that is perfectly understandable. Ask the same question to seven out of ten boys in camp, and you might get the same answer.

It is particularly understandable coming from Welles, who has a marked leaning toward the Latin type beauties, you may remember. For three years he was devotion itself to exotic Dolores Del Rio. And while Rita looks more typically American than typically Latin since she turned herself into a redhead she is originally a Cansino—one of the dancing Cansinos from south of the border.

Maybe Rita saw Orson's amusing "ad" in the Skolsky column that first time—and maybe she didn't. But she was bound to have seen subsequent "ads," for if Mr. Welles had been willing to let the matter end there, Mr. Skolsky was not. From time to time he reminded his readers, and also Rita and Orson: "Orson Welles still wants to meet Rita Hayworth!"

When a lady is lonely, that is flattering—particularly when a girl is blue and not working.

But that's as far as it went until one night, out of sheer desperation from staring at the same four walls so long, Rita and her secretary and boon companion, Ruth Rose, went to Lucey's for dinner.

Lucey's is one of the few cafes in town where two ladies may dine without too noticeably attracting the attention of the Wolf Pack. Located across the street from the Paramount Studio and in a direct line with RKO and Columbia, it is a convivial meeting place for the elite of all three lots who can afford stiff prices for the excellent cuisine.

Of course, this was the particular night Orson Welles had elected to dine at Lucey's with a party of friends. And if you do not believe this was thoroughly accidental and completely in the lap of fate—then you mark yourself as a confirmed cynic and probably as an undying fan of Vic Mature's.

Naturally, Rita saw Orson, and Orson saw Rita. After that well advertised campaign of Skolsky's, it was a little difficult to be completely oblivious of one another. But no spark of recognition lighted their eyes until a roving cameraman asked them to pose in a picture together.

Rita protested politely. She did not think the picture would be a good idea. She knew darn well it would not if Vic ever saw it. If it had been almost any other person in Hollywood—but Orson Welles—it might have been different. Vic is jealous, and his jealousy is notoriously allergic to "geniuses."

But, in the meantime, the cameraman had asked Orson to pose—and always the gentleman—he was delighted. Rita did not want to appear rude. So she invited Welles to the table so she could explain in some sort of fashion—hardly the real reason—why she did not want her picture taken.

Orson sat and chatted for a moment, which was not lost on the more or less innocent bystanders—you can bet on that.

Whether he is your private Dream Boy or not, there is no denying there is great personal charm in Welles. He talks brilliantly and amusingly and continually—particularly if his listener is a charming and very beautiful one like Rita who does little talking under any circumstances.

Among other things Orson said he was planning a camp tour in the near future under the auspices of the Hollywood Victory Committee.

"Are you going to scare the boys to death with another Men from Mars idea?" laughed Rita.

"No," explained Welles, "I've been working on some magic tricks. I'm getting pretty good at them."

For the next hour he showed the girls some of the more simple stunts of the no-card-up-my-sleeve variety. Rita was amused. It was the nicest evening she had spent in a long time.

"Some of these tricks have to be done with a partner," Welles went on to say.

Rita said, "Show me an easy one. We'll try it out on Ruth." Before the girls departed that night from Lucey's, Rita had picked up a few "mind reading" gags and was doing very well tossing the right cues to the new Hollywood Magician.

Orson walked out to their car with them. "Look here," he suggested, "how about working up some really good stunts with me? The Victory Committee might—just might, you know—happen to send us out on a camp tour together sometime!"

"That's funny," said Ruth, "Rita has been approached by the Victory Committee about camp tours. She has been thinking about it." The funny part of it is—Rita had.

Welles has never been accused of being a bashful lad—and under the circumstances, bub, would you have been shy, either?

So that is the way it happened that Orson started to drop up to Rita's house with some of the newest formulas for amateur Magic. Of course, Hollywood began to hear ripples of it: "Hmmmmm," mused the skeptics, "what kind of magic? That Old Black Magic, maybe?"

Then in the weeks that followed, Orson and Rita began to be spotted in the quietest corners of the least populated cafes.

"Hmmmmm," mused Hollywood again, "if there is nothing to it, why are they so secretive about stepping out?" Even a Hollywood cynic should know the answer to that. No matter how platonic their friendship—and Rita swears it is—Vic would raise the roof about it.

Of course someone told Vic—wrote him, rather, about Orson and Rita and the quiet little cafes, as someone is always sure to do. No one should have taken that on himself or herself.

If anything, any important thing, had come into Rita's life that Vic should know about—then it was up to Rita, and to no one else, to let him know how things stood. But Rita persisted that she loved Vic, and we are pretty sure she did—and does.

Late last April, Vic came back to New York on leave. He was not going to be in the country long—only a few days—which is no longer any military secret. There was not enough time for Rita to fly back and see him. She could not have gone away because the studio suspension was unexpectedly lifted, and she was back at work again at Columbia in "Cover Girls."

So the lovers talked on the telephone, a talk that led from one bitter word to another. "He wouldn't let me explain anything," Rita wept. "He wouldn't listen.

"If we could have been together for just a little while, everything would have been different. I love Vic, and he is the only man in my life, even if he is as stubborn as a mule. But it is no good trying to solve anything over the telephone.

"Now all I can do is wait until we can see each other again. But this has made me realize that it would be folly to marry while the war is on—while we have to be separated from each other whether we want to be or not.

"If I could only tell him how very lonely it has been, I know he would understand. I know in my heart, no matter what he says while he is angry, that we are not through. Not really. We are just waiting . . ."

As thousands and thousands of other girls are waiting, puzzled, confused, unhappy, and bewildered who do not bear such glamorous names as Rita Hayworth's.

And now it is up to you to name the hero, the heroine, or the heavy of this story. Frankly, we can't—no matter what happens.

M. Boyer, the French star of "Mayerling" was very lonely in Hollywood. He met (at right) Pat Paterson, a lonely, blonde, English girl, starring at Fox.

with the loving care of a bank merger. He selects his stories with great thought and comparison of scripts. He studies his roles with intensity. His record of hits includes only two so-called flops, although they were money makers. They were "Tovarich" and "Back Street." It could not be said that Boyer gave a bad performance in either.

On the set, while he is charming and considerate of everyone, there is none of the horseplay and hail-fellow-well-met feeling the other actors favor. He is congenial with crew and cast. He is letter perfect in his lines. As he walks up and down rehearsing his lines to himself, he thoroughly enjoys watching the laughing and joking that goes on. Yet while he never joins in, he never gives the feeling that he is annoyed. He will laugh and chortle if someone makes a remark about the toupee he always wears on the screen.

However, he is entirely serious about the business at hand, that of making a good picture. He is a great student of the art of movie-making and watches with interest, as a student, the lighting, directing, and all the mechanics that go into making a picture. Boyer's observing always pays him dividends. "Flesh and Fantasy," his picture he co-produced with Julien Duvivier at Universal is interesting film fare.

When you know this solemn "studio" Boyer, to see him with his friends is a revelation. He is always the leader, quietly and almost unconsciously keeping the interest of the situation around him, guiding and leading to bring out the best in each person. His circle of friends is small. Closest are the Adolphe Menjous and the Ronald Colmans.

Recently Boyer was overjoyed when his friend Kisling, the great European painter, made his home in nearby Beverly Hills. Sunday morning breakfasts at the Kisling studio are now on the Boyer social calendar. There Boyer, his mother, Pat Paterson, his wife, Andre David, great French writer, and many other French artists sit around a great square table and eat typical French country food and discuss conditions of the world. Many of the people who sit in this room owe their arrival in America from war torn Europe to the quiet brown-eyed man who sits at the head of the table.

Boyer has brought to this country, or helped when they got here, French war orphans, artists, musicians, writers, and just plain people who are too numerous to mention.

Boyer is not one of the fabulously wealthy Hollywood film stars. While he is comfortably well off, he still has not been in the big money brackets for the length of time that chalks up a fortune. Nevertheless, great sums of his earnings go constantly to help European refugees to rehabilitate themselves in a strange land. Even larger sums go to feed French war orphans in his native country and French war prisoners of the Nazis. Besides this, he is a contributor to every accredited charity and war relief and tireless in his personal appearances and bond tours in the interest of his adopted government, America. Here in the United States he is one of the high leaders in the Free French group and one of the most respected. His whole life and mind, these days, is set on tirelessly working in the interest of a peace for the world and the care of stricken people in war torn countries when this peace does come.

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences presented Boyer with a special plaque this year in recognition of the outstanding work brought about by his new French Research Library, which he founded and built in Hollywood. It is open to the motion picture studios for their research, to the local colleges, and is gaining a reputation throughout the country for the fineness of its material. It is to this library many evenings after finishing a job at the studio, the "great lover" goes and works on research until only the necessity of studying his lines for the next day ever gets him home to bed.

In his home, he is a gracious host. His perfect wife, Pat Paterson, is his perfect counterpart. His house is not, as reported, a fabulous palace. It is rather a beautifully appointed home set far back in the Beverly Hills, the home of a finely bred man, decorated with the taste of an intellectual man with a great love of beauty. It is a house of quiet gracious charm, a setting for the people who live in it, and first and foremost a home. It has carefully chosen paintings, books, and music, each piece having a meaning to its owner. The concert pianist, Artur Rubinstein and his wife, are great friends of the Boyers, and whenever Rubinstein is in Los Angeles, he spends many of his free evenings with Charles and Pat, playing the piano that is almost entirely reserved for his visits.

Boyer spends much of his time at home in his gardens, walking up and down, up and down, smoking cigarette after cigarette. After dinner, which is always simple, perfect in every manner, and carefully served, he is accompanied on these walks by two wiggling dachshunds and assorted cats. His mother has a small house set charmingly among some trees on his estate. The association of Boyer and his mother is one of the most touching and beautiful things to know about this strange man.

Vacation periods are spent at home, usually short days when he is not on a picture or on a tour of some kind in the interest of charity. It is then that Pat invites friends up to swim in the pool and to play tennis with Charles. He is an indifferent swimmer and a rather good tennis player. Both sports are taken almost as medicine, as he must watch his figure. However, when he does get into the game, he puts up a good fight and seems to forget temporarily all the problems that fill his mind.

He has a delicious and enchanting sense of humor that pops out at the most unexpected times. Once when in New York he was teasing a very close friend. This friend had confided to Boyer that he had taken his girl to a certain bench in Central Park and kissed her for the first time. A few days later Boyer and his friend were crossing the park and Boyer came to an abrupt stop in front of the bench. The friend, deep in conversation, didn't notice the silence of the actor for a few minutes and then finally said, "What's the matter?"

Boyer continued to stare at the bench and finally said, "It certainly doesn't look awfully comfortable."

Admittedly the Hollywood press finds Boyer hard to talk to. They go expecting to find the great lover. Instead they find this serious person. Courtesy, charm, and cooperativeness are the name for Boyer, but he cannot talk about his private life, possibly because he is so conscious that it doesn't match up with the torrid love revelations of the other film favorites.

Reporters end by saying that he is bad copy and a good actor. That he met his wife and married her within three weeks certainly would make good copy, but he won't talk about it. That his marriage is happy and that the secret of this happiness, would make a good story is just as true. But he won't talk about that, either. That there has never been a breath of scandal about him in Hollywood might make dull reading alongside of the juicy divorce revelations of other stars. Boyer senses this.

That the public wants to know what he eats, whether he wears blue and white striped pajamas, if he loves children, and who he thinks are the ten most exciting women on the screen seems to him of no importance. It is most important to him, though, that he be allowed to do his work on the screen and given sufficient time to work out each portrayal; so it is something to be proud of and pleasing to the public.

It is important to him that he earns money enough to be able to carry on his great work toward winning the war.

It is important to him that his circle of friends remains happy and healthy and not torn apart as his friends are in Europe. His wants are simple; his emotions and desires are all constructive.

It is difficult to match the Charles Boyer of the screen and the Charles Boyer of private life, but both are fine men with great heart and idealism, and you should remember both when trying to understand either, for the sum of them makes a very great actor and gentleman.

HOLLYWOOD'S NEW GLAD GIRL

by ALICE L. TILDESLEY

HOLLYWOOD has a new Glad Girl.

Maybe you don't remember Pollyanna, the original Glad Girl who flourished two decades ago. In case you don't, she was a young person who went around with a pious smile, no matter whether she lost her purse, broke her leg, or became an orphan. She could be glad about anything, and she was so offensive about it you could have slapped her down with pleasure.

Our new Glad Girl, Mary Lee of Republic Pictures, isn't like that at all. She's glad as can be, but also delightful.

She's five feet and a scrap of an inch tall, has silky brown hair brushed so that it shines, big brown eyes, and a mouth that curves naturally into a smile when she isn't pulling it into one of three dozen comic expressions.

They call her "Buster" and "Little Guy" around the lot, which isn't much more glamorous than "Butch," her nickname in her first professional engagement as girl singer with Ted Weems' band. She was twelve then. Mary and her father and sister Vera were a trio, singing hillbilly songs around her home town of Ottawa, Illinois. Up to that time, the biggest thrill of her life had been a visit to Ottawa of Gene Autry, who had actually shaken Mary's hand and given her one of his song books.

Ted Weems was making a nationwide search for a girl singer, looking for a grown-up star like Dorothy Lamour. The Weems band played at a dance at Starved Rock State Park, near Ottawa, and the manager suggested that Mary get up and sing during the affair.

The manager considered this a great joke. Mary was delighted. She was even smaller in those days, so she stood on a chair to sing, entirely in earnest about joining the band, putting over "Sissy" and "Please Be Kind" with a personality that brought down the house. The joke was on the manager. Ted and his band decided that their search was over.

Mary's father had always been very strict about his daughters' working at their music. Now Mary was glad of it, for the habit of working hard was formed; and it was no trouble to work the long, often wearying hours with the Weems band.

"We were just a happy family," Mary remembers. "Only now I had fifteen godfathers, each one nicer than the others."

Her mother started out with them; but she had, because of illness, to leave the tour. The godfathers chaperoned fourteen-year-old Mary thereafter. Jack Garber, the manager, used to wake her every morning and shepherd her to school. The rest of the band called him "Mother Garber" but he didn't mind. They all petted and kidded

'Butch" and told her what to do. Moreover, she did it. She was sweet and kiddable and thought everyone wonderful.

When the band was playing at Catalina, Gene Autry, who had no recollection of a bright-eyed youngster in Ottawa, heard Mary on a broadcast and asked her to visit him on the set. Gene was on the point of leaving the country for a tour of Europe, so Mary attached no significance to his invitation. She went, saw how pictures are made, watched Mr. Autry at work and thought: "Am I the lucky girl!"

But when the band reached New York some months later, Gene was in town, having left Europe at the outbreak of war. The cowboy star hadn't forgotten "Butch"; he arranged an audition with Republic Studio executives, and the next thing Mary knew she was signing a film contract. As leading lady, she made nine pictures with Gene Autry, beginning with "South of the Border."

They made Mary a star at Republic recently in "Shantytown," a fact she can hardly believe and which produces in her a happiness she is too young and too unaffected to conceal. She has established a home for her family, and they all have a wonderful time together.

"Daddy's a Senior Air Raid Warden now that we all live out here in the valley," says Mary. "Mother's a WIN, because she takes care of our home, but she's also taking a home nursing course so that she'll be ready in case she's needed, now there's a shortage of nurses. Norma Jean, my little sister, goes in for scrap and rubber drives and all the things school kids do these days.

"Vera, my older sister, is a WAAC. We're all so proud of her, we ache! They let me go out on army shows when I'm not working in a picture, and Vera and I hope that if they let me go on tour I can play Des Moines while she's there.

"At most army shows, you're just part of a show, fitted into a program with a lot of other acts. You come on and do your stuff, sing your songs, bow and leave, and you don't get a chance to dance with the boys or talk with them. Perhaps if they let me go overseas, I'll be allowed to meet the army. Won't that be a thrill?"

Of course cute Miss Lee has been down to visit Gene Autry's branch of her service at his training field, and to entertain his Air Corps friends. To her, Gene Autry is something very special.

"The first day on the set, after I came to Hollywood," Mary told me, "I had that awful all-alone feeling. I didn't know what to do or how to do it, and I knew I was terribly young and dumb. But Mr. Autry smiled at me and said he was sure I'd be good in the picture. He showed me about camera angles and the little camera tricks you have to know. He'd watch me in my scenes and tell me what I was doing wrong. I used to have a little habit of putting out my tongue—sort of wetting my lower lip—" she illustrated, her pink tongue making a brief cat flick in and out— "and he called my attention to it. That trick would look awful on the screen.

"If I ever get to be an important star, I hope I can be like Mr. Autry, so kind and sweet to people who aren't anybody. I don't think he could be arrogant if he tried! He's not only pleasant, but he helps you.

"My mother answers my fan mail for me, but I always read it. I like letters that tell me what people think. Today there was one from a little girl who doesn't want me to ever wear my hair in pigtails again. I don't look nice that way, she says. Of course it isn't up to me to say how I'll wear my hair in a picture; that's the studio's say-so, but it's nice of her to care.

"My one beauty secret is my hair brushing. I never have my hair washed—it's professionally brushed twice a week, including a dry shampoo." She shook back her shining, silken mane.

"I'm so glad I'm at Republic—it's just like a happy family!"

There she goes again—the Glad Girl. But after I had walked from the gate to the stage and then to her dressing room and out again, with everyone we met greeting Mary Lee joyfully as "Hi, Buster!" and "Hello there, Little Guy!" and "Well, well, if it isn't Our Girl!" I saw that there may be something to be said for it.

Our modern Glad Girl is glad because she's out of school at last and needn't spend half her life studying.

She's glad that it looks as if she's going to be lucky in Romance. Not that she will permit a word to be pried out of her about Him, because he's not in the acting profession and wouldn't understand if she broke into print all of a hoo-ha about him.

And she's glad the studio is letting her look glamorous for a dream sequence in her next picture.

"I'll look the way you dream of looking, with wonderful long glamour gowns and spectacular hair-dos and make-up that will cover my freckles and make me beautiful—for a change," she added, with a giggle and a little flirt of her agile fingers.

It's marvelous to be glamorous once, she has decided, but she doubts if she would care to keep it up. A glamour puss has a horrible responsibility to her fans, says Mary. One hair out of place, one broken fingernail, one smut on the nose, and who knows, you may spoil a beautiful fanship.

Apparently all Mary needs to do when she meets a fan is to smile, say hello, and sign something. She likes them all before she sees them, anyway.

She gets along with everybody. She has spells of admiring other girls who sing in pictures, and when Mary admires anyone, brother she admires her! She begins to look like her, too. You know when she's seen a Judy Garland picture by the way she looks, her sister says. When Ella Logan was out here, Mary looked like Ella for weeks.

"The way I learn is by watching people I like," she explains. "I never had a singing lesson in my life, and the studio doesn't want me to take them. I'd like sometime to be in a musical comedy on the stage, with lots of good songs and a chance to move around without thinking of the microphone. Sometimes you can't help believing your mouth's going to grow mighty funny looking, all the time aiming itself around the corner at the mike!"

Another thing Mary Lee likes is to be right in the thick of things.

In California's last blackout, when the alert sounded, she was down in Long Beach, right by the ocean, sitting with the personification of Romance in a place where they have the grandest food you ever tasted. The cafe was blacked out, naturally, but they brought candles, and the whole affair was a Great Adventure.

"It was such a thrill to be right in the middle of where a raid would be, if there was a raid," she exulted.

It didn't occur to her to be frightened. But after all, why should she be frightened with Romance across the table!

Tall girls like MGM's Virginia O'Brien often wish to appear shorter, so Ginny obligingly illustrates with her new summer wardrobe how she achieves this illusion. She goes in for dresses in two contrasting colors, to begin with. In the large shot to the left, for example, Ginny wears a one-piece dress with a two-piece look, its skirt a white print background with a design in blue and black. The cross-front bodice is of black crepe. Her flat as a pancake hat has an inch high black satin crown with a brim of five layers of black maline.

At the far left—Virginia's favorite summer suit has a Navy skirt and a waist-length bolero in lipstick red, edged with Navy yarn in a button-hole stitch. Her Breton sailor is of Navy felt with a shallow brim and crown.

THE DRESSES ON THIS PAGE→

Above—carrying out the same "two-section" motif, the singing Miss O'Brien wears one of the very popular peasant dresses, this one having a red, white, and blue cotton challis print skirt with a wide girdle and hem line bands of black velvet. The blouse is a ruffle-edged crepe in a blue to match the skirt. Peasant dresses are wonderful "duration" clothes, as they are feminine, charming, and never go out of fashion.

Upper right—for dressy occasions this "shirt top" dress with large patterned black and white print blouse and draw-string waistline skirt of black crepe is very keen. Virginia wears a large brimmed hat of black cellophane straw with a daisy covered shallow crown, short white washable gloves, a flat black bag, and black patent leather pumps with this.

Right—even if you don't want, as a tall girl looking small, eternally to wear "contrast dresses," you can still deceive the eye. A dressmaker suit, like this in brown and white silk print, will do the trick by the ruching at the yoke and hem line. Virginia's hat here is a ruff of beige feathers on a shallow pillbox of matching felt. Incidentally, you'll see the girl next in "DuBarry Was a Lady."

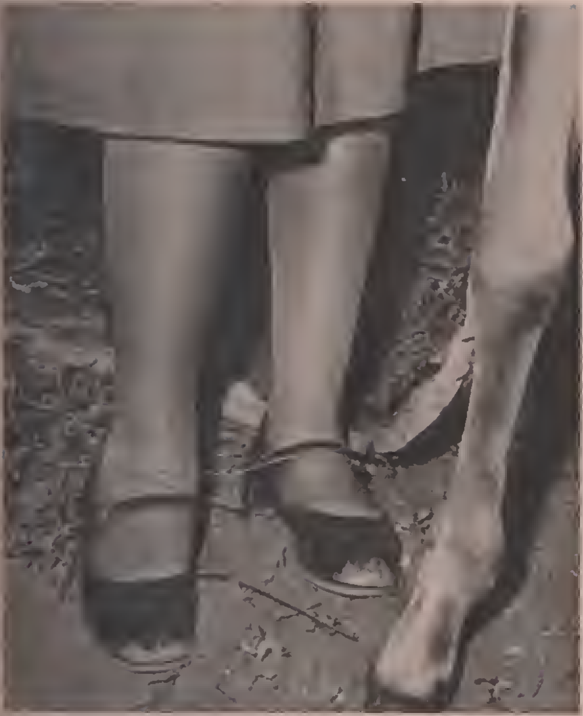
Her studio says she will soon be a star.
She has an Irish name and a torrid look.

Oooh Look - LEGS
BUT WHOSE LEGS ARE THEY?

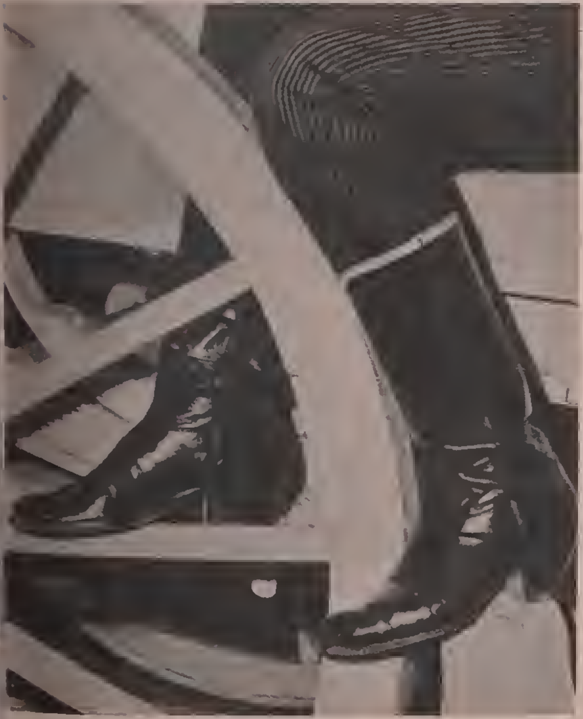
She's the on-screen sweetheart of a many-talented guy; she's the off-screen wife of an important business man. She'll never have to worry about the supply of Nylons as long as there are any anywhere.

Once she was dreaming of a White Christmas, but recently she returned from a tour of the Alaskan camps, which made her hope she'd never see snow again. She's new and purty.

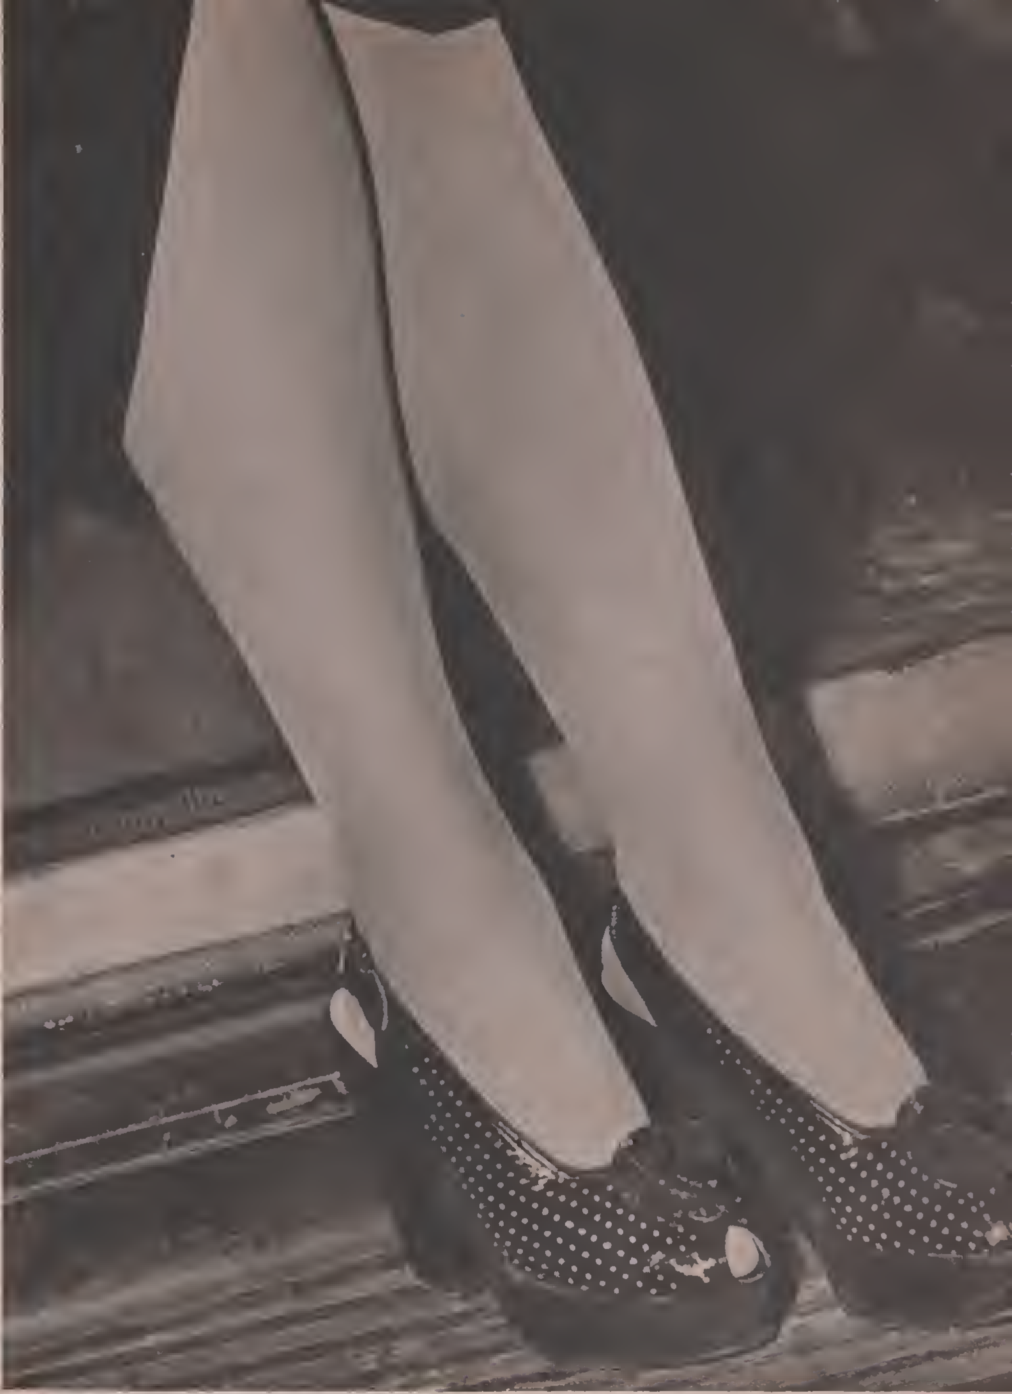
This little girl went to Mexico on her vacation
This little girl works hard at the Canteen
This little girl is a great dramatic actres
. . . and she is not Bette Davis.



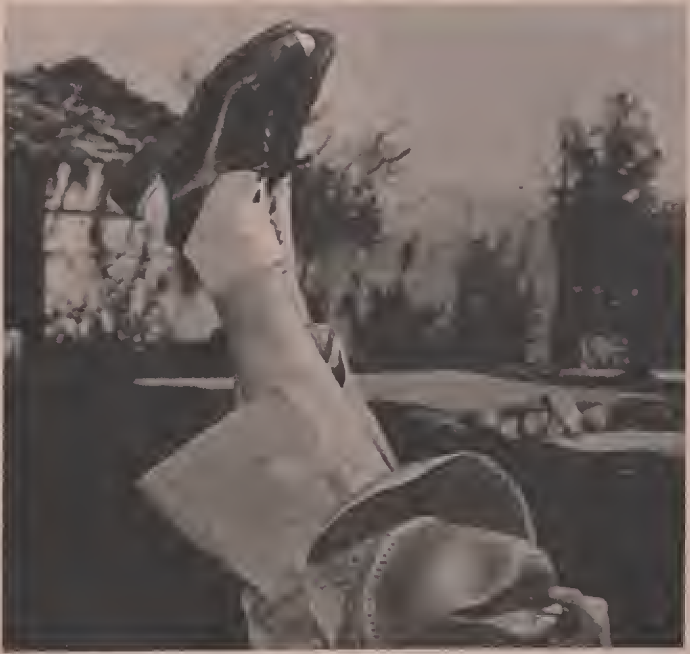
These sturdy gams belong to a comedienne who is now for the first time essaying tragedy. You see three legs there? Well, now—after all—we're talking about the two at the left.



Men have legs, too. This guy has played one character more times than Lewis Stone has lectured Mickey Rooney. This guy got married for the third time, almost seven years ago.



She's one of the ringleaders of "the younger set." She's a great pal of the girl in the large picture on the opposite page. Recently she made a small-cost picture that turned into a major hit.



She's a glamour girl. She's a best dressed woman. Her heart belongs to a soldier. Despite those flat heels, she dotes on luxury. Guess hard.

IF YOU GIVE UP, TURN HERE

HERE ARE THOSE LEGS ALL FIGURED OUT

Dolores Moran, dear public, the new wow of Warners'. Like Alexis Smith, she's said to be spectacular in films that haven't been released.

Paramount's own young Marjorie Reynolds, who after visiting Dutch Harbor and such outposts, is trying to arrange her picture schedule so she can visit camps every six months.

Ann Rutherford, Mickey Rooney's own Polly Benedict of the Hardy pictures, is really Mrs. David May, which means the wife of the owner of one of Los Angeles' biggest department stores

It's Joan Fontaine, here sitting on the piano bench at the Canteen, ready to go into the autograph routine for the boys. Joan, finished with "Jane Eyre," had to vacation alone, husband Brian Aherne being busy at Columbia.

Did you guess? Oh, surely not. Anyway, those legs belonged to Jane Withers. And with Jane are the animal kingdom and Farley Grainger—all of whom are in "North Star."

The star of "Hitler's Children," that cute cookie, Bonita Granville, best pal of Ann Rutherford, Anne Shirley, and all that crowd, an on-screen meanie and an off-screen charmer.

THE PRIVATE LIVES OF

THE FRED MACMURRAYS

This is Lillian's bedroom. Fred baught all the items for it while she was ill, during the entire first year of their marriage. Lilly knew just the type af antique lace curtains she wanted for the bed canapy and the windaws.

Every abject in every roam af the MacMurray house was carefully purchased by Fred and Lilly. "It's a very simple, hamey hause," says Lilly, "but it is exactly the kind that Fred wants."

This is Fred's bedraam, adjaining Lillian's. "Ah, it's nat much af a place," says he. "Why, Fred, that old sailor chest is enough to make it distinguished," repraves Lilly.

THIS, WE WARN YOU, IS A LOVE STORY—AND PROVES THAT TWO REAL PEOPLE WHO ADORE ONE ANOTHER CAN STAY HAPPY DESPITE ALL ODDS

Another shot of Fred's room. "He furnished all this himself," says his proud wife, "picked out everything personally."

BY NATALIE VISART

THE Fred MacMurrays, together or separately, are not supposed to be "good copy." Interviewers groan at the thought of extracting personal information from Fred. The MacMurrays don't live fabulously or sensationally. You never hear "rumors" about them, and they probably bore the keyhole columnists to death. They've been married seven years, and they still live in the same house. They still speak. In fact, they are still in love. Obviously, they must be very dull, indeed, to keyholders.

Far be it from me to tangle with such folks, but, inasmuch as I am on the inside of the keyhole, I must say I disagree with them.

I met Fred and Lilly first at a party while Lilly was still Miss LaMont and beautiful she was, too, that night in black tulle with her shining black hair and her pale, lovely face. I remember regarding them with interest, for I'd seen Fred around Paramount studios, where I work myself. He was then, and still is, a shy, quiet guy whose simplicity and obvious lack of exhibitionism seemed strictly out of character for the acting profession, to my way of thinking. Nice kids—very much in love, I thought to myself. I wondered what would happen when Hollywood hit them.

Well, over a period of eight years, I've had an excellent opportunity to observe what happened, for we became very good friends. And I remember recalling that first speculation of mine last Christmas morning as I sat with them around the tree, opening packages and watching Fred happily and painstakingly build a cardboard farm which he had bought for Susan, their small daughter, "because," murmured Lilly as we exchanged amused glances, "Susan would have such fun putting it together." Missy Susan, we noted with relief, oblivious to the "fun" she was being deprived of, hung equally raptly over a rag doll Ann Sothern had sent her. I remember looking at this normal family scene—still nice kids and still very much in love—and I wondered what had happened. Why hadn't Hollywood hit them?

Perhaps it goes back to the very beginning—to the qualities they saw in each other which drew them together in the first place.

They met in New York during the rehearsals of the musical show "Roberta." Sitting next to each other one day, they fell into conversation. Such questions as "where are you from?"—"what does your father do?" etc., established rapidly the fact that they had similar backgrounds and fundamental tastes. When lunch was called, they proceeded to a Broadway drug store, which was the beginning of a daily routine of meals together and, interestingly enough, always Dutch treat, for Lilly had discovered that Fred was, out of his small salary, supporting his mother and paying off a large debt.

What the debt was she didn't know. Fred didn't explain that it was money he had borrowed to pay for an operation for his mother. Fred didn't explain and Lilly didn't question, and they ate Dutch treat except on Sunday, which was Fred's day to pay for everything. They found themselves extremely happy with the arrangement and each other.

Fred had found a charming and sensible girl who understood a great many things without being told—who, although she was a model and a show girl—and a beautiful one at that—preferred the corner drug store with him to the glittering night spots with any of the stage door Johnnys who would have been delighted to take her.

Lilly had found a tall, curly-haired boy who treated her with respect—whose quiet acceptance of his responsibilities and obligations impressed her immeasurably. As for Fred, he didn't think it dull that Lilly didn't drink, and he thought her small apartment, with its simple early American furniture that she had collected and paid for out of her small salary, far more indicative of her qualities as a homemaker than the silver fox coats most show girls save for.

Those were the qualities they saw, and those are the qualities that have endured. When Lilly, a month after their wedding, became very ill and was in bed for fourteen long, weary months—surely a difficult first year for any couple—their relationship and their marriage seemed to grow firmer, closer, and stronger.

They were building their house, and Fred had to go alone to hunt for the old pieces of American furniture with which they had planned to furnish it. So—out he'd go at night and on his days off—make sketches and come back to Lilly to see whether that was what she wanted before he got whatever it was.

When the house was finally built, he carried Lilly in and through the rooms, in which every piece of furniture was placed exactly as she had planned—up to her bedroom where, for the rest of those months, she was to remain. Hollywood certainly had its chance during that period to hit, but courage, faith, patience, and unselfishness, I guess, defeated it.

As to their life now that Lilly is well and strong and Fred an extremely successful star, well—Old Lady Hollywood is still finding the MacMurray marriage a hard nut to crack.

The usual weapon, jealousy?

I asked Lilly about that one time when we were in her dressing room doing our faces and taking down our back hair (it's astonishing how, with one's mouth full of hairpins, one's reticence vanishes). Lilly chuckled, "You're worse than the boys at the Canteen, honestly."

Lilly is a hostess and Fred a bus boy there Friday nights. A group of the boys were questioning Fred: "Who's your favorite actress?—Do you like Claudette?—What's Roz Russell like?—Have you ever worked with Crawford?" etc., when suddenly one fellow realized he had the guy's wife standing next to him. "Say," he challenged, "how does it feel to have your husband working with these glamour pusses all day—making love to them and all?"

"I don't think," Lilly continued, relating the incident to me as she squinted a critical eye at her shining black pompadour, "that he believed me when I said they were all girls I knew—friends of mine—and that it was difficult to think of them and their love scenes other than that they were earning their bread and butter just as Fred was."

"Yes," I persisted, "but doesn't it seem strange to see and hear him saying to some other dame things he's maybe said to you?"

Lilly regarded me in the glass with amusement. "Natalie, you know Frederick! He never talks like any love scene in any picture, which is maybe why he finds them so difficult. He's always groaning, 'Lilly, how'm I going to say that?' when he's studying his script, except, of course, when it's a script Claude Binyon has written for him. Claude knows exactly how Fred talks and his left-handed approach.

"Of course, there's one thing about having your husband work with all the glamour girls. I sometimes get fashion tips in advance. You should have heard Fred describing one of Claudette Colbert's suits that she wears in 'No Time For Love.' 'It's sort of cut out here and has some sort of colored stuff like the blouse stuck in it.' 'And what's the skirt like?' I asked. 'Well, it's just a skirt,' he said, looking surprised. 'Yes,' I said, 'but skirts are different. Is it flared, straight, draped, or what?' 'Oh,' he said, 'well, it's sort of straight—well kind of thin, but then kind of sticks out here—oh, it's just a skirt,' he said finally in desperation. I wish Irene could have heard his description of her latest creation," Lilly grinned.

The MacMurrays live well and charmingly but simply. Thursday nights find Lilly cooking dinner and Fred helping with the dishes. After dinner Fred generally retires to the piano where he is likely to play one chord over and over till he gets it the way he wants it, while Lilly, settled to her knitting, quietly goes mad until he does.

And speaking of going mad, Lilly and I drive poor Fred equally nuts with our ever avid interest and chatter about clothes. He usually stands it as long as he can and then mockingly launches into a dissertation about tweeds, pant lengths, and snap brims, which always reduces Lilly and me to giggling helplessness. After I saw Fred in "Star Spangled Rhythm" in the skit "If Men Played Cards as Women Do" I knew where he'd got his inspiration. That business with the brief case, he admitted, came straight from his memory of Lilly and me emptying our suitcase-like purses to find an elusive lipstick or key.

Even Susan apparently has observed us, for one night when I dropped into her nursery to see her, she entertained me busily the entire time by showing off her wardrobe. Struggling in her closet, she would emerge proudly, "See—new panties," for all the world like her mother showing me her newest hat.

At the rough-hewn antique table in the living room bay window, Fred and Lilly go over the bills on "the farm" they have in Northern California. They consult one another on everything.

They love little gags like this—an antique meat block, polished and used as a corner table, an old butter mold which they plan to use on home-made butter.

Every year Lilly gives Fred a surprise birthday party. Fred, of course, would only be surprised if she didn't. However, it's a sort of ritual to maintain the pretense of surprise on everyone's part. Lilly and I start days ahead making lists, and fall strangely silent whenever Fred enters the room. If Fred has forgotten that the event is nearing, this conveniently serves to remind him. If he's on a picture, Lilly is enormously relieved, as it means he'll be out of the way, because, of course, nothing can be done till he's out of the house.

One year (this was in pre-war days) the party had elaborate proportions. Among other features there was an awning to be erected over the terrace with a front of cellophane through which one could look out over the garden and pool. That year, a calamity occurred.

Fred announced the night before his birthday that he didn't need to be awakened early. He had, he explained, no studio call for the next day. He wasn't in the scene they were shooting.

Lilly was frantic. What to do? She got a certain amount done while he slept in the morning, but just as Fred was getting up, the tent man arrived. Lilly told said tent man to take his truck and park around the corner until Fred was out of the way. That morning of all mornings Fred, who usually eats a light, quick breakfast, ordered cereal,

These are loquat trees planted all around the swimming pool. Lilly cans the fruit.

Daddy and Susie feed the chickens out at the end of the garden. Movieland is proud to be the first magazine permitted to photograph Susie.

Fred built this chicken coop himself. Each hen has her own space and her name above it. Elegant names, too, like Theda, Brenda, Gloria, Cobina. "Yah," said Mr. MacMurray, "somebody will think we put those eggs here." "Don't be silly," said Lilly. "Who'd be that wasteful?" Fashion note: Mr. MacMurray wears those old pants, those old shoes, that beard, and nobody can stop him.

eggs, and bacon. He wasn't deliberately teasing Lilly. He had for once forgotten what day it was. It would have been perfect if he'd only had to go to the studio. But no.

"Well," said Fred, finishing his coffee, "let's go to the beach today."

"I can't," said Lilly. "I've a lot to do. Why don't you go and play golf?" The Birthday Child, it seems, was not in a golfing mood.

"Then hunting," suggested the frantic Lilly, but it was not the right season, it seemed.

"Frederick," finally said the desperate lady, who, after all, had a tent to run up, "I don't care what you do. Just get out of the house and stay out till seven-thirty."

Along about five o'clock, as she stood in the midst of a battery of small tables on the terrace, counting silver, filling cigarette boxes, doing the thousand odds and ends a hostess must do before a party, she heard a very small-boy voice: "Lilly!"

She looked up and there in the garden on the other side of the cellophane stood her very sheepish husband. "I couldn't think of anything else to do for the rest of the time. Couldn't I come in now?"

Those birthday parties are the one and only big party the MacMurrays give during the year, and they are always the best. I have memories of Jack Benny playing his fiddle and Fred his saxophone while the bewildered but delighted orchestra tried with considerable difficulty to follow; of Carole Lombard, exquisite in a flowing white dress, doing an exhibition dance with Cesar Romero and then suddenly clowning and burlesquing it and Clark laughing at her till the tears ran down his cheeks; of Jimmy Stewart, home on leave, sitting at the piano for hours, while all the available gals gnashed their teeth.

Until the war came, with its separations and disasters, the same people, year after year, were always there. Fred and Lilly are as constant in their friendships as they are about other things. Nor are those friends all celebrities or people in the Hollywood social swim. A good many are people even as you and I. Fred's best friend and pal for years has been Colin Tapley, a good but not famous young actor, now in the Canadian forces overseas. It makes no difference who you are if the MacMurrays like you. If they don't, it still makes no difference who you are.

The MacMurrays have bought a farm in Northern California, an honest-to-goodness producing farm where they often go in between pictures and where Lilly says she hopes they can some day live all the time. They renovated the hundred-year-old house which was on the property, keeping all its old charm even to the watery imperfect glass panes in the windows. Lilly, who doesn't drive a car, is thrilled with her horse and buggy for shopping in the village.

Her last letter to me from the farm which, incidentally, is called just that—"the farm"—indicates that their life there has the typical MacMurray approach.

The letter reads: "I've meant to write before but always so many things to do here on the farm, as we haven't any help in the house, and it means everything must be done somehow and, what with cookin, butter-churning, cleaning, and preserving, idle moments are few and far between. Fred is gardening and planting vegetables and, although we won't be here to enjoy them, at least he's getting good practice for his Victory Garden at home. By the way, I made my first loaf of bread, and it was pretty good."

This is my picture to you of the MacMurrays—the nice kids that Hollywood doesn't seem to be able to knock off balance.

THE END

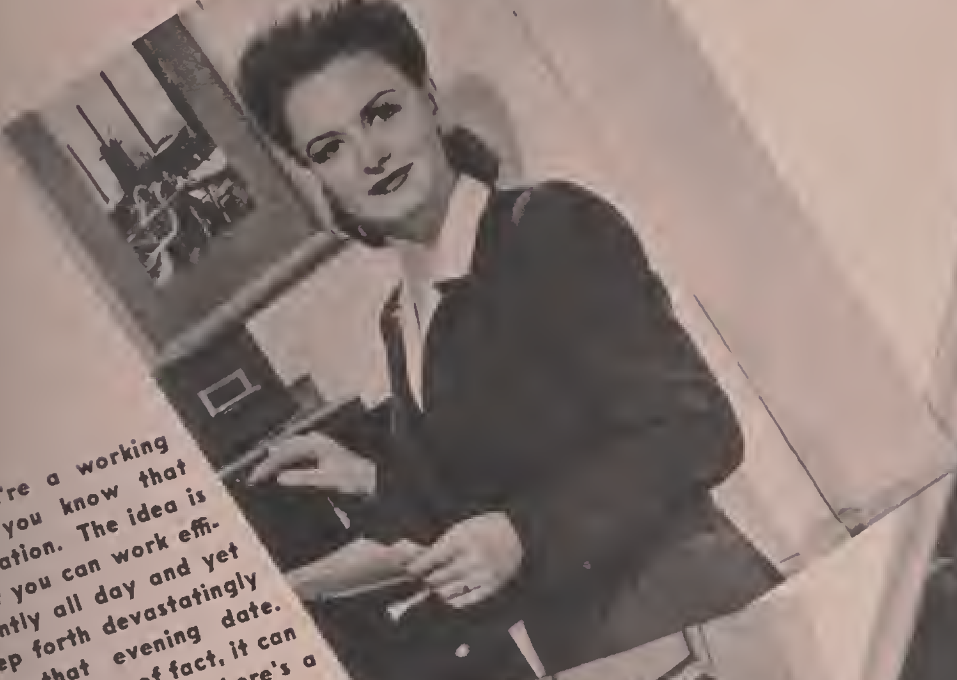
MOVIE STARS ARE FANS, TOO!

PRACTICALLY all the stars in Hollywood proved they were fans of Madame Chiang Kai-shek when she came to Hollywood. They were so over-awed by Madame Chiang at the reception given in her honor that a member of her party had to tell them, "Madame just wants you to be at ease."

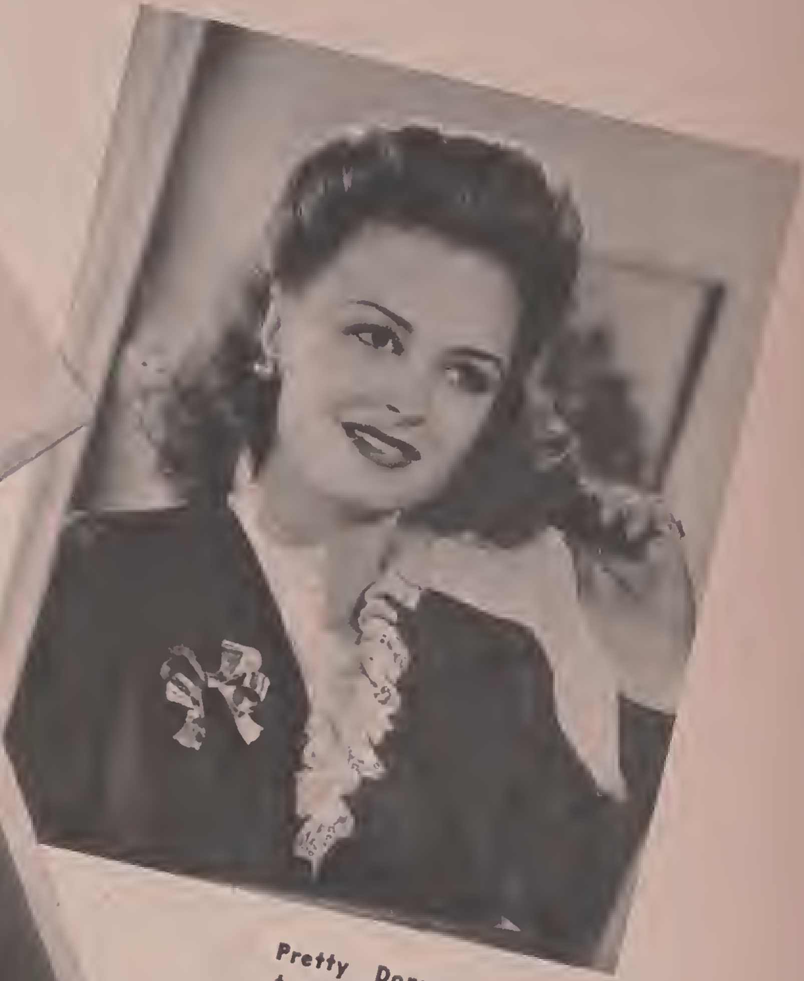
Gary Cooper blushed, his face turning a fiery red when Madame Chiang Kai-shek held his hand. Marlene Dietrich was thrilled when the Missimo asked her about her daughter. Fred Astaire was flattered when she told him that a member of her family had tried to re-create some of his dance steps, but hadn't been able to pull it off.

Of all the people in Hollywood who met Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, the meeting probably meant most to two people: Anna May Wong and Luise Rainer, who has been an adoring fan of the Missimo's for years. And no wonder! For when Luise appeared in "Good Earth" it was Mme. Chiang Kai-shek who wrote her a note thanking her for her wonderful portrayal of a Chinese woman. Luise sent to the Missimo peach blossoms in token of her gratitude. Years passed, and Luise took an active interest in the Chinese people and Chinese relief. And always, the Missimo, with whom she sometimes corresponded, was her inspiration. She was beside herself with excitement when she met her in Hollywood and the Missimo personally thanked her for what she had done for China. Later, Luise tried to express her feelings in a letter to the Missimo. She re-wrote it twenty times. With it she sent three white orchids.

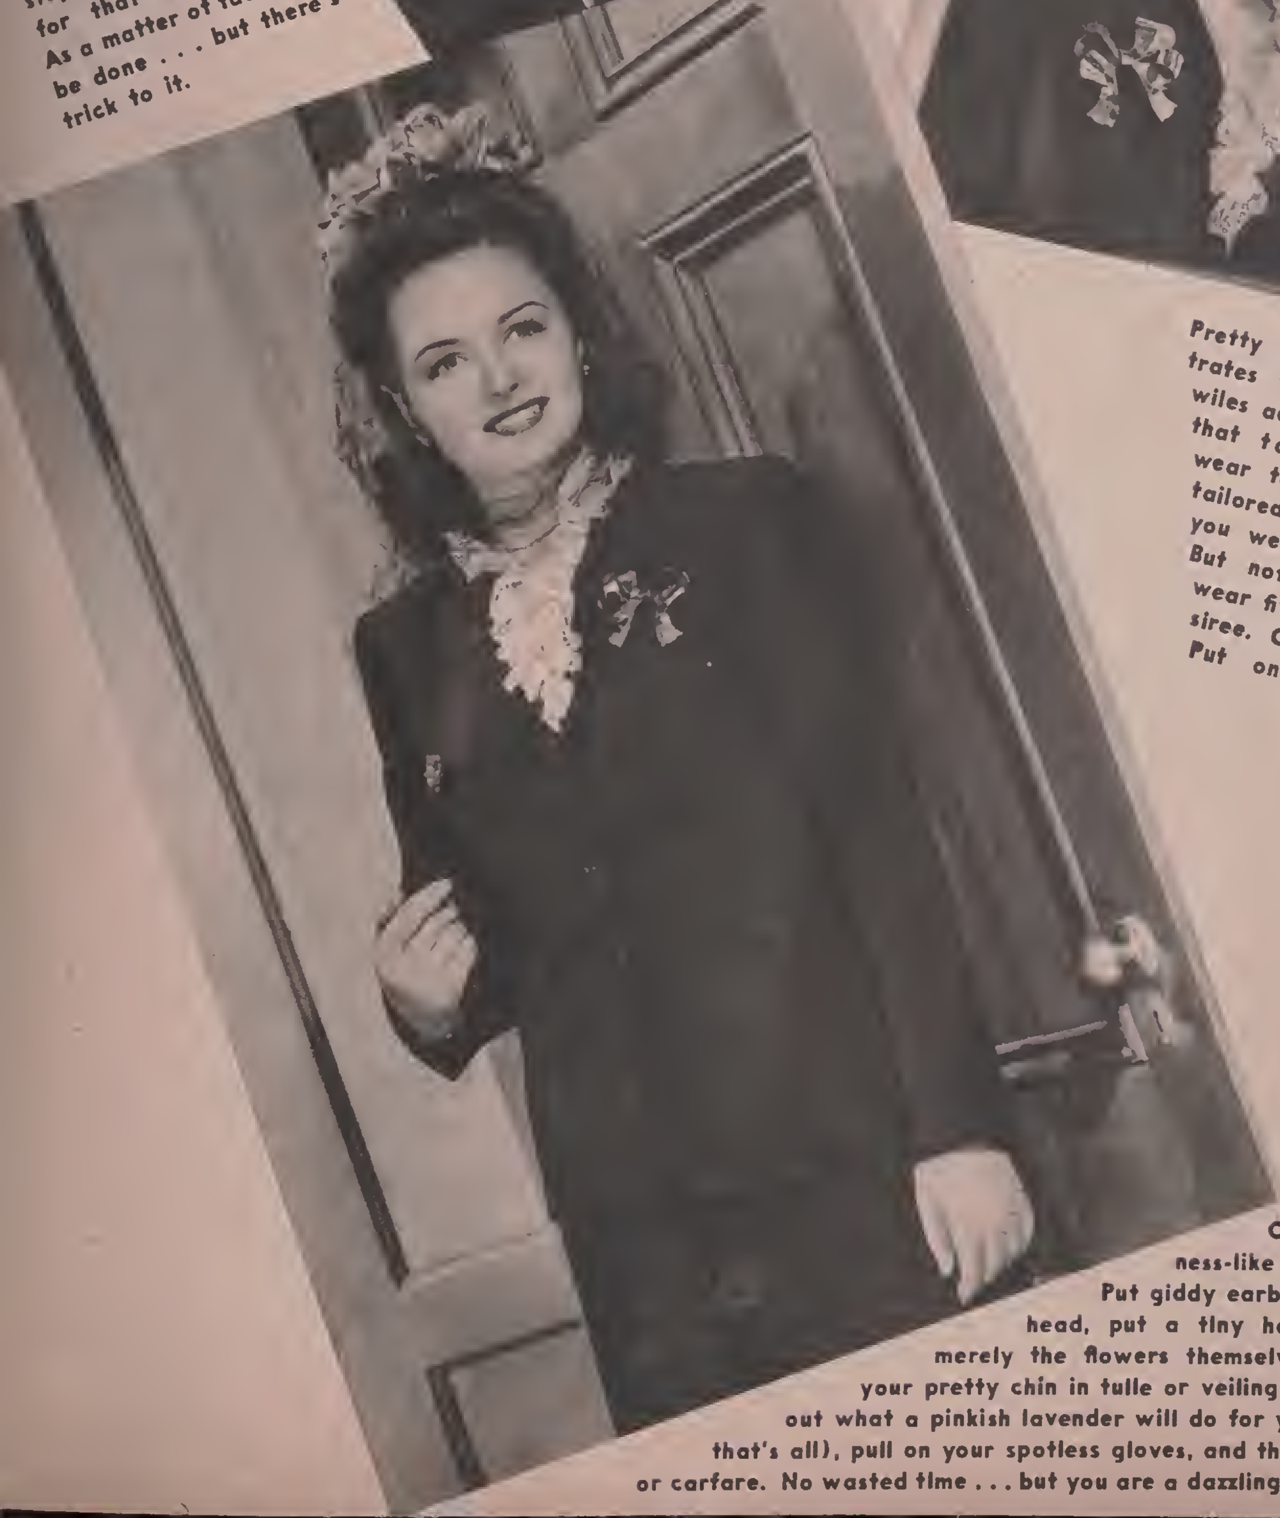
"COME RIGHT FROM THE OFFICE"



you're a working girl, you know that invitation. The idea is that you can work efficiently all day and yet step forth devastatingly for that evening date. As a matter of fact, it can be done . . . but there's a trick to it.



Pretty Donna Reed illustrates the from-work-to-wiles act. You begin with that tailored suit you wear to the job. Very tailored is the blouse you wear nine to five. But not the one you wear five to ten. No, siree. Change blouses. Put on some frills.



Comb your hair from its business-like slickness into girlish softness. Put giddy earbobs on. On your freshly gay head, put a tiny hat topped with flowers (or merely the flowers themselves if you prefer). Swathe your pretty chin in tulle or veiling (have you ever tried to find out what a pinkish lavender will do for your skin—pure enchantment, that's all), pull on your spotless gloves, and there you are. No wasted gas or carfare. No wasted time . . . but you are a dazzling dame, and the man hunt is on.

With the world at war, the only voyages any of us can make are those in memory. Here are the colorful episodes that a dozen Hollywood people love to recall above—Believe it or not but Glenn Ford once spent a night in a Cuban convent.

below—It's a tragic street that Basil Rathbone most recalls.

TREASURED in the memory of most men is the recollection of some particular street in a strange city. In recalling a journey, the mind again traverses some avenue upon which an odd incident occurred, or revisits a lane that challenged the imagination.

With so much of the world in the process of destruction, with the romantic being crushed under tons of rubble, it becomes important to collect some of these quaint memories and to record them. To preserve, also, impressions, experiences, and invitations to drama that motion picture people, yarning before an open fireplace, confide to one another.

REGINALD GARDINER likes to tell about Watling Street which runs, like a dotted line, from the English midlands to the sea. Watling Street consists of segments of the old Roman military road built around 55 B.C. In the countryside the road has entirely disappeared. The stones, eloquent—by reason of their rubbed and polished surfaces—of long-dead marching feet, have been dislodged and piled into fences by farmers. But through the villages the dashes of history still run, sometimes existing for only a portion of a block, sometimes extending for some distance. Narrow and crowded, Watling Street can be found shooting out at an astonishing diagonal from some main thoroughfare. Its topography is never the same in any two villages or towns, but its identity is preserved. No matter where this ancient ghost road appears, it is labeled on the side of buildings: Watling Street.

ON NOVEMBER 11, 1918, Raymond Massey was a Captain of Royal Canadian Artillery, stationed in Vladivostok. (Today, he is once again in service, in Canada, appearing occasionally in government-sponsored productions like "The Invaders.") In 1918 he was walking along Pushkinskaya (Pushkin Street) when news of the signing of the Armistice was received. Vladivostok, never a city to win international beauty prizes, was an exceptionally remote contender in 1918. The shops were weathered clapboard, innocent of paint. The streets were usually rivers of mud, churned by the inadequate boots of American, British, Canadian, and Russian troops.

Until that November moment, none of the military units had viewed any other with less than loathing, but upon word that the war was over, the mob rushed into the street, shouting, yelling, raging, pouring from bar to bar, and singing the same songs in three languages and forty dialects.

BARELY eighteen, John Loder, he who now dates Hedy Lamarr, was a member of the King's Hussars, a cavalry division with the British Expeditionary Force sent to France during World War I. One night his outfit was moving up through Bray Sur Somme, a small French village blasted to bits by artillery fire. The front had receded from this sector, leaving nothing but torn trees, jagged sections of brick wall, and an occasional fireplace and chimney as desolate totems of a vanished time.

In the distance rumbled the unceasing thunder of artillery fire presaging the break-through on the Somme. A full moon, low in the East, reflected itself a hundred times on the helmets of the cavalrymen; a milky white ground fog completely obscured the bodies of the horses, so the troopers looked like giants whose bodies rose out of an unearthly mist to glint in ghostly procession. The only sound in the column, like an obligato above the distant brass of the guns, was the tinkling of the bridle rings, the squeak of leather, the intermittent whinny of a horse. and the rhythmic cadence of marching hooves upon the cobbled streets of the dead town.

PAUL LUKAS, freshly returned to Hollywood for "The Watch on the Rhine," as becomes a man from Budapest, has a romantic memory.

As a juvenile in Hungary, getting a lean start on the stage, he fell in love. Also, in the grand tradition, he was broke.

Yet in the evenings, he went down to a small shop where the salesman was generous. He bought a sack of the Hungarian equivalent of cracklings for five cents, and stowed this viand in his right pocket. He bought a sack of small rolls for five cents and put it in his left coat pocket. Then he and his dream doll went strolling along the Danube, munching their al fresco dinner seasoned with the sauce of happiness.

JUST before the current war broke out, Bop Hope made a trip to England to see his grandfather, aged ninety-six at the time. (As this article was written, the determined old Englishman was still alive and in good health, despite rationing, bombing, and threat of invasion.) As a side trip Bob decided to visit the house in which he was born in Eltham, Kent. He knew the name of the street—Creighton Road—but he lacked the street number. Bob drove up and down the street, enchanted by its appearance. It was a typical English lane, bordered by dozens of tidy houses, nestled deep in their gardens. Like many an English village street, it curved graciously past a small hill and into the down country beyond. Bob peered at each house in turn and consulted the psychic summons that he felt should point out his birthplace. The gremlins must have been tampering with his home-detector, however, because no memory, no sense of belonging, arose to point an invisible finger. To this day, Bob has no idea in which house he was born.

BETTE DAVIS' memory of England is tainted with treason to her sex. It dates back to when she had gone to London to defend herself in litigation with Warner Brothers. She had intended to remain only one day for her testimony, so brought along one suit and three blouses.

What was her astonishment, upon arriving at The Courts, to find news photographers everywhere. She hadn't expected the English to recognize her.

Instead of appearing briefly, Miss Davis had to remain in London a week, and each day, as she walked down the street, she was extensively photographed. Finally one morning, a cameraman said, "Miss Davis, would you mind changing your dress tomorrow so we can get some fresh-looking pictures?"

Another spoke up vehemently. "Don't do it, Miss Davis," he cautioned. "From now on, every time my wife complains that she has only one dress in the closet, I'll be able to tell her, 'What's good enough for Bette Davis is good enough for you.'"

GLENN FORD has the distinction of having spent a night in a Cuban convent. It came about because of his curiosity in regard to a street (22 Animas) in Havana. Entrance to the avenue was through a grilled iron gate. Glenn wandered in and strolled along, peering at the thick walled ancient Spanish buildings. However, when he reached the end of the block, he found the exit gate closed and locked. He swung around and made for the entrance. Likewise locked. After he had rattled the gate long enough to dispel any notion of breaking his way out, Glenn attracted the attention of a guard whose face was very solemn, although his eyes tilted suspiciously at the corners.

In a mixture of Spanish and English the guard explained that some of the stouter convent buildings were used as a prison. Havana, along with several other Latin American countries, has the amiable custom of allowing her prisoners a certain amount of freedom during the day, but curfew is at six, at which time prison becomes physical. The prison buildings and the gates were not reopened, the guard regretted, until six in the morning no matter how blameless the accidental trapee.

"I can't stay here on the street all night. I'll freeze," said Mr. Ford, taking a pessimistic view. The guard indicated the church where, he explained, services were continuous. Warmth was to be had, and enough activity to be diverting.

The guard didn't explain that the only worshippers during the prolonged hours of the night were the nuns and their charges, who were happily unconscious of a tall, slender young man being as non-existent as possible among the shadows. The next morning Glenn was at the gate at six, along with a tatterdemalion group waiting for their daylight freedom.

COMING somewhat closer to home without sacrificing the Spanish atmosphere, we have the case of Kay Kyser who with a tourist's true abandon, had been in Los Angeles only a few hours when he visited Olvera Street.

This lane, only a block long, is a reconstruction of the old pueblo's first thoroughfare. Nowadays, it is lined by dozens of Mexican curio shops. Dusky street singers pluck guitars and small harps while dark-eyed urchins sing.

Mr. Kyser espied a display of huaraches (sandals woven of rawhide thongs) and made inquiry. Si, si, the shopkeeper said, he could make a pair of huaraches to order—exactly to fit the Kyser foot. He had Kay remove his right shoe and place his foot on a piece of paper to be outlined.

Mr. Kyser returned at the specified time and picked up his purchase, but when he got home he found that, although the right shoe fit like a second skin, the left was too small. He returned to Olvera Street and ordered a second pair. This time the merchant outlined the left foot. When Kay collected the second pair, the left shoe was like a cradle, but the right was too large.

Mr. Kyser returned to his favorite street, which was rapidly losing its standing (no pun intended), and ordered his third pair of shoes. This time he had the merchant draw around both feet. And the third pair of shoes were sweeter comfort than walking in cotton candy.

BOB CROSBY's orchestra had played "Basin Street Blues" every night for years, so it was only natural—while he was touring the South—for Bob to go down to Basin Street to have a look-see. It was approximately six in the afternoon, and street traffic was considerable. Bob mooned along, peering into shop windows, but mainly listened to the jive talk and the slurring soft idioms of the hot fudge belt.

He knelt to tie his shoe, and as he rose, a voice said caressingly, "I wouldn't make no fuss, was I you, Boss. I would ca'lesslike pull mah wallet out, let it fall, and leave it lay. Was I you, I would tote mahself down the street, an' I wouldn't look back, onless I craved a ve'y close shave."

Mr. Crosby complied. As he toted himself down the street, he was humming those Basin Street Blues.

SEVERAL years ago, while Basil Rathbone was touring the United States with Katherine Cornell in "The Barretts of Wimpole Street," someone told the newly-arrived Englishman that he must be sure to stroll along the well-known, segregated street of New Orleans.

After final curtain one night, he and Guthrie McClintock ventured forth, their attitude that of any two normally curious and fascinated tourists. They returned, a pair of thoughtful and shaken men.

The street was lined with identical small brick houses in each of which there was one door and one window. Forming the top half of the door was a shutter. Police regulations forbade the women to address any passerby, but as the men walked along, the shutters softly clicked open, and in each narrow aperture appeared a dead white face punctuated by a scarlet mouth.

The instant an officer appeared at the head of the street on his patrol, a quaint sound echoed through the street. It was like the tattoo of a stick being dragged along a picket fence—click, click, click—as the shutters closed.

From your own experience, what street do you vividly remember?

Dorothy and her true love, her husband, Captain William Ross Howard III.

Below—Dorothy, at the age of six in her Sunday-best.

Bob Hope and Bing Crosby made a bond saleswoman out of Dorothy by the wackiest methods.

The Life and Romance of DOROTHY LAMOUR, whose lovely lissome figure takes more pin-up space in barracks or ship cabins or lonely outposts than any other star in the glamour brigade, has never been affected by the snare and delusion of fame. To her today, it's just a good way to make a living.

She is not one to gnaw her fingernails over what critics may say, and she does not pose in dramatic pathos before a mantel bare of everything but gleaming Oscars. Today, Captain William Ross Howard III's picture up there is enough.

But it wasn't always thus. She had to go through suffering and unhappiness before she reached this wise simplicity. It was Dorothy Dell, her closest friend, who prodded and pushed and argued Dottie Lamour into taking an interest in show business. Beautiful, talented, boundlessly ambitious; that was Dorothy Dell, and she was loyally devoted to her school mate, the shy, skinny, self-effacing Dorothy Lamour, who wanted merely to be happy.

When Dorothy Dell won the mouth-filling title of "Miss Universe" in the national bathing beauty contest, and was offered a job in the Ziegfeld Follies, she refused to go without Dottie the Second. Instead she signed with a Fanchon and Marco vaudeville act because they agreed to take her friend. Then she had to talk Dottie the Second into it.

Eventually that act was booked in Los Angeles, and the two girls rushed right out to see Hollywood and gazed awesomely at the outside of Paramount Studios, but no one gave them a second glance. When the tour ended, Dottie the Second returned to New Orleans. She had gained in weight and self-confidence, but she didn't think much of show business. She got a job with a home town real estate company. Dorothy the First, the ambitious one, went on to New York.

New Orleans was having another beauty contest, and the promoters, busily rounding up shapely contestants, called little Miss Lamour in on the strength of her previous entry in the annual affair. Dottie the Second had to buy her bathing suit on credit.

Dorothy Lamour

Dorothy as she is today—and over there at the left is the off-screen Lamour in those early days when all she wanted to do was to get back to her husband, Herbie Kay.

She won. This really stirred ambition in her. She began to get excited over the possibility of following Dorothy Dell to New York, but that hope fizzled out when she lost in the finals at Galveston. Dorothy the First's letters consoled her by insisting that the place for Dottie the Second was New York. The only flaw with that argument was that Miss Lamour couldn't raise the fare for that destination, but she did reach Chicago and eventually found that now-famous job running an elevator and modelling clothes at Marshall Field's store. Once again, this star-to-be consoled herself with the idea that show business wasn't for her.

So what happened? The Follies came through Chicago, and with them Dorothy Dell, with her buoyant enthusiasm and determination to help her chum find a career. At this stage a third Dorothy entered the plot. Dorothy Dell interested Dorothy Gulman in Dorothy Lamour, and that combination was a winner. Gulman was an agent who eventually obtained the audition for Lamour that led to a singing job with Herbie Kay, the band leader.

Dottie sang with Kay's band, traveling from place to place. She hated it. She finally decided to go to New York where she could live with her mother. She was tired of show business.

By the end of the first week it dawned on Herbie Kay, as such things will, that the departure of Dorothy Lamour had left an aching void. He had to wait till the Chicago engagement closed, but the moment it did, he hurried to New York and proposed.

Although Dottie had started singing in radio, she had missed him, too. Stymied by the three-day law in New York, they flew West and were married in Waukegan, Illinois. How this little elopement coincided with Dottie's idea of romance can be understood now.

She was in love, first love, and she didn't think how life with an itinerant band is just one series of one night stands or at best a few weeks, a succession of trips where you left one place at midnight and then jammed drums, saxes, and traps aboard a bus for a jolting ride to the next town. She didn't consider it was the life she had all too recently disliked. She wanted a home. She wanted domesticity. Eventually she went back to New York where she had a contract with the National Broadcasting Company. The idea was that she'd establish a real home for herself and Herbie, a home that he could live in during whatever free time his tours permitted.

Thus in 1935 when NBC decided to originate the program in Hollywood and wanted Dorothy to go out there, she refused. Herbie talked her into going. Apparently what settled the matter was all that beautiful money, since they agreed that when they had acquired enough capital, Dorothy would retire.

And so, as previously recorded, Dorothy and her mother arrived in Hollywood, with her mother keeping house and Dottie singing. To supplement her far from munificent pay as a sustaining artist, Dottie got an engagement at the Clover Club, then a popular movie rendezvous. Immediately the studios began calling her to make screen tests.

A talent scout in New York had once argued her into making a screen test, and even he hadn't been able to compliment her on the results. So now Dottie just laughed and shrugged the calls off.

The NBC artist's bureau grew insistent. The thought came to Dottie that Paramount was the studio where Dorothy Dell had been in pictures. She had told Dottie how kind they were to her, how much she liked all the people at that studio, before her tragic death in an auto accident had stopped her brilliant career. But—once again as Lamour's guiding star, Dell had voiced the wish that Dottie could work there, too. Now, what would Dorothy Dell say if she could know that Dottie the Second had rejected an offer of a screen test there?

Dorothy Lamour's loyalties go deep. She took the test.

But later she made a decision. From all she had heard, Hollywood wasn't a town for a girl who was more interested in a home and a husband.

"Even if they want me in pictures," she said to her mother, "it isn't my idea of a life, at all. I don't want to be a career girl. Herb has that job in Denver now, and maybe he won't have to move around so much. I'm going to quit everything—not even sing with the band—and go stay with Herb."

Dorothy quit Hollywood cold.

And then, a month later, in Denver, the front door bell rang and a messenger handed her a telegram.

> PLEASE COME TO STUDIO
> AT ONCE. WE HAVE A PICTURE FOR YOU.
> ADOLPH ZUKOR.

It would have made any other girl delirious with joy. That slip of yellow paper, creased and dog-eared, but treasured as if it were a parchment diploma, is still among Dottie's possessions. Yet that day it brought her no happiness and only greater problems.

Dottie worried about showing it to her husband, but Herb was delighted. Of course she must go.

Finally after long discussions, she made up her mind to obey the summons. But just for one picture! That was all.

Dorothy went through the routine of signing the usual seven year contract, with options, starting at two hundred a week, hardly believing a word of it. She was one of the few survivors of the old fashioned age of long hair. Paramount, it seemed, wanted her to play a primitive maiden in "Jungle Princess," in which she would peer like a startled fawn through her long hair, while coyly pretending ignorance of the amorous attentions of Ray Milland. Even for a low budget picture it set new economies in the way of a wardrobe. She was handed something called a sarong, with an extra one in case of emergency.

Dorothy spent six week dunking herself in a cold creek that runs through Paramount rancho, eating bananas, holding hands with a chimp named Jiggs, and hiding behind palms from the screen advances of Ray Milland. She was convinced the picture would be the flop of all time.

The on-screen Lamour as she appeared in her first movie, "Jungle Princess."

The result, as you know, measured in box-office terms, was terrific. Paramount picked up Dottie's options as if they were nuggets. Astute Mr. Goldwyn borrowed her and the sarong for "Hurricane." Paramount had found a gold mine in this girl who was not only beautiful but could sing, and Paramount intended to cash in on it all.

All this was quite outside of Dottie's original calculations. According to the popular idea, when you make a hit in pictures, the money rolls in too fast to count. Actually, the contracted salary stays the same while expenses skyrocket.

She had come to Hollywood only to get wealth for herself and her husband. Yet when the studio called her to make song tests for "High, Wide and Handsome," starring Irene Dunne and Randy Scott, her mother was ill and an operation had become necessary.

Because Carmen Lamour needed the money, Dottie, without revealing her mental anguish, went to the studio the morning of the operation and recorded the songs. That was more than just a singing test; it was a test of character. Not until the job was done did she rush to the phone, to be told her mother was going to be all right.

Among the obligations imposed by picture popularity is the duty owed to the film fans, and until this has actually been experienced, their insistent adulation and the continual demands of people cannot be imagined. The public suddenly turns into a sea of clamoring voices and outstretched hands.

Dorothy had sensed that this would happen. A patient attitude toward it all might have resolved the misunderstandings that arose, but now little differences between them took root and grew. Columnists trotted out their time worn cliches that start: "Who was that handsome young man with Dorothy Lamour at the 'Troc' last night?" These items pay no attention to fact; it's just an easy way to mention a popular figure. Yes, the things that sting are little things, but enough of them can kill. Dorothy and Herb were divorced.

Even greater success came to Dorothy Lamour. Her voice reached the millions who heard her each season on the Charlie McCarthy show, and one picture followed another. She had few vacations. Each year her salary went up another notch, so that she could build the modest home she and her mother had always wanted. When Mrs. Lamour married Dottie's business manager, O. L. Castleberry, Dottie was completely happy.

Being a sociable girl, Dottie enjoyed going out, but as for falling in love, no thank you!

Dorothy always has had the faculty for earning the friendship of other girls. Her two closest companions were Laura Lamarr, a movie extra, and Kathleen Coughland, a publicity woman. It was Kathleen who went with Dottie on her war bond tours to the four corners of the country.

Oddly enough, Dottie's friendship with Bing Crosby and Bob Hope helped her emerge as the Government's top salesman.

She had been not only the object of their affections in those hilarious screen adventures from Singapore to Morocco; she also had been the patsy for all the pranks and jokes those two fun-loving guys could devise.

Veterans in the quip and wisecrack, Dottie was fair game for their constant ribbing. There were times she got so mad she was ready to quit, which of course meant the ribs came oftener than ever.

She finally made up her mind to beat them at their own game. She just relaxed. They'd dangle the bait and she'd merely grin. They knocked themselves out trying to get a rise out of her. And bit by bit she sharpened her wits so that she could pay off in kind.

When Dottie faced her first big crowd at a bond rally in Chicago, thousands of students were around the platform. She was wearing a sweater, which was a tactical error, and the students began to whistle and shout. Dottie grinned and relaxed at the wisecracks and tossed them back, hot and heavy, throwing in some sizzlers she'd learned from Bing and Bob. She figuratively rolled up her sleeves and let 'em have it. They cheered her when it was over, and stampeded for the bond wagon.

It was between bond tours and pictures, a brief interval indeed, that Dottie at long last met the right man, and fortunately knew it. She and Laura Lamarr were at Arrowhead Springs when the Army Air Force camp at San Bernardino invited Dottie to come over and sing for the boys. They sent Captain William Ross Howard III, who lived near the hotel, to escort her to the base.

Dottie learned that Bill came from Baltimore. She had spent some time there when Carmen was having a check-up at Johns Hopkins hospital, and so there were mutual friends to remember and discuss. That was the beginning.

By the time Bill had taken her out a few times, both knew what would be the outcome, and when Bill was taken desperately sick in San Francisco and Dottie and Laura flew up there, it was obvious that this at last was love—not like her girlhood crush on Herbie.

This marriage was going to be all that Dottie had missed in life. When her pal Kathleen married, Dottie was her bridesmaid, and it was agreed that Kay would be hers if and when Lamour married. Kay wore blue, and Dottie wore pink; they liked the color scheme and vowed they would use it again. There was only one circumstance that prevented the fulfilment of this plan when Dottie married Bill. Kay's baby had arrived and she was unable to go to the wedding.

But Dottie carried out the arrangement and wore blue, while Laura Lamarr, as bridesmaid, wore pink. Then, while several hundred guests waited at the reception Paramount gave in their honor, she and Bill drove to Kay's bedside.

The wedding had been all that Dorothy had dreamed about, in which she stood at the altar with her close friends and family, and there were the soft strains of the wedding march. There were gardenias, Bill's favorite flower, everywhere. Little boxes for her guests to take home a piece of cake to dream on. At last a small town girl had come into her own. Her happiness was worth waiting for.

This time she intends to keep it. If she thinks that Hollywood threatens her happiness, there'll be only one answer.

She'll exit, laughing, from the Hollywood scene.

THE END

It was Dorothy's own idea to make that first bond-selling tour. After that, the Treasury Department has counted her as their head saleswoman.

Movieland Selects Five "Best" Pictures This Month

MISSION TO MOSCOW

(Warner Brothers)

IN no sense can you list this under conventional entertainment. Essentially it is a preachment, concerning modern day Russia as seen through the eyes of one of our former ambassadors, Joseph E. Davies. Movieland feels that "Mission to Moscow" goes overboard on propaganda, particularly in the last half, and thereby loses much of its punch, and yet we advise your seeing it. It has the value of being living history, of being provocative, thoughtful, and stimulating. It is also magnificently produced, acted, and directed.

Joseph E. Davies was sent to Russia by President Roosevelt just prior to Hitler's entry into Czechoslovakia. Entering the capital of Communism as an alert observer, Mr. Davies remained to become an impressed friend. He wasn't content merely to see Moscow and the swank diplomatic circles. He visited factories, small villages, farms, and the centers of war games.

Walter Huston sensitively portrays Mr. Davies. Ann Harding is delightful as Mrs. Davies. Oscar Homolka gives a masterly performance as Maxim Litvinov. There are some hundred other speaking roles, portraying the world figures of Churchill, Stalin, Marshal Timoshenko, and others who are all excellently played.

If you aren't politically minded, this will bore you excessively, since there is no "plot," no "love story." But if you are interested in the life and times of one of our greatest allies, then you will find "Mission to Moscow" lingering in your memory, long after you have left the theater.

Yes, you may—and you may not—disagree with much of its point of view, but you will not find it dull entertainment. If you've a mind for this sort of thing, see it.

STAGE DOOR CANTEEN

(Sol Lesser Productions)

THE super-duper entertainment bargain of all time, "Stage Door Canteen," actually has a cast of seventy-two major stars, ten completely new but highly competent young players, six knockout bands (Goodman, Kyser, Lombardo, Martin, Cugat, and Count Basie), and fifteen musical numbers. If in the midst of all this, the story is a bit weak, who cares?

Hollywood producer Sol Lesser created this keen movie with the cooperation of the so-called "American Theater Wing," which means the association of all the top Broadway theatrical people who are united in maintaining Broadway's "Stage Door Canteen" for the benefit of service men. The largest proportion of the profits will go to the Canteen, and thus Mr. Lesser was able to bring to the screen such personalities as Katharine Cornell, Helen Hayes, Lunt and Fontanne, and the sixty-odd others.

The story is necessarily simple, the saga of three soldiers on leave in New York, about to sail they don't know where. At the Canteen they meet three girls and react in their individual ways. Screen newcomers William Terry and Cheryl Walker are the pair who fall in love. Young Lon McAllister is the boy who has never been kissed. Michael Harrison and Margaret Early are merely out for the laughs.

On this thread of a plot are strung the acts, Cornell doing a bit of "Romeo and Juliet," Gracie Fields singing, Yehudi Menuhin playing the "Ave Maria" of Gounod, Gypsy Rose Lee in a comedy strip tease, Lanny Ross putting over a great tune, "We Mustn't Say Goodbye," and all the others in specialties too numerous to list.

Go see this. You'll have a wonderful time for yourself—and be doing your bit for our boys, too.

DU BARRY WAS A LADY

THIS is the daffy picture of the month.

Red Skelton is a hat check boy, Louie, at a very swank nightclub. Both he and Gene Kelly, the hoofer of the floor show, are dazzled by the show's leading lady, Lucille Ball. Lucille has a yen for Gene, but she struggles against giving way to it, her only aim in life being that of acquiring a rich husband. Just as she is about to succumb to Gene's charms, Red wins on a sweepstakes ticket. Quick-like, the hat check boy proposes. Lucille agrees to wed him, but only for his money, please.

This chilly attitude doesn't deter Red from being gay as a goon over the coming wedding—that is, until he is taken temporarily out of this world by a Mickey Finn. In this fine state he dreams—and what a dreamer he turns out to be. He wakes up in a Louis XVth bed, for the jolly reason that he has become Louis XV himself. He is quite naturally bewildered by this until he discovers that Lucille is Madame Du Barry, and it is conveyed to him that King Louie has a very torrid friendship with Madame D. Red goes for this in a big way.

His bliss is bothered by Gene Kelly, who turns up, too, as the Black Arrow, a swaggering guy who is trying to get his gang together, stage the French Revolution, and part Madame Du Barry's head from her pretty body. However, comes love between the Black Arrow and Du Barry, and Red is left out in the freeze.

Things get back to 1943 before the fadeout, but meantime everything is looney, including Tommy Dorsey and his band in satin waistcoats and wigs and Virginia O'Brien singing "Salome," which rendition will knock you in the aisles. Go see.

PRESENTING LILY MARS

THERE'S nothing very original about "Presenting Lily Mars." It's as old as young love. There's nothing "superb" about it. But it's so heart-warming, it concerns such pleasant people, there's so much straight, good fun in it, that we think you'll have a wonderful time seeing it.

Judy Garland, looking, singing, and dancing enchantingly, is Lily, the stage-struck daughter of a scatter-brained widow with four other little girls. Mama and the kids think Lily a perfectly terrific actress and also think the fact that Mama's closest friend, Mrs. Thornway, is the parent of stage producer John Thornway makes everything cozy. Mrs. Thornway agrees with their rosy point of view, fixes it up for Lily to meet John when he comes home for a brief rest.

Of course, Lily is the ham of all time, and John lets her know it, at first politely, then angrily, finally violently. But don't think this stops our heroine. She follows John to Broadway. She invades his theater during rehearsals. She mixes him up nicely with the star of his show, who has a crush on him. She gets herself and John in so wrong that nothing but love could ever put it to right. So love does just that, but not at all in the manner you would expect. Which is the secret of the charm of much of "Presenting Lily Mars."

Besides Judy, there's Van Heflin, absolutely socko as the producer, Richard Carlson, very delightful as an amused playwright, Martha Eggerth as the angry girl friend, and Fay Bainter and Spring Byington as the two mothers. To top this, there are Tommy Dorsey and his orchestra and Bob Crosby and his orchestra, which is more than a bit of all right.

Do you think you'd like it?

CRASH DIVE

(Twentieth Century-Fox)

MARINE PRIVATE TYRONE POWER makes his last appearance for the duration in "Crash Dive." It's a fine, temporary bow-out for Ty, who is his most ingratiating, handsome self throughout the whole thing.

Ty is a Naval officer who has distinguished himself in a branch of the service he loves—the speedy PT boats. Therefore he is mighty disgruntled when he is transferred to submarine service and told he is about to go on a Commando raid to a Nazi naval base. Ty's attitude is very irksome of Dana Andrews, the Lt. Commander in charge of the sub. When the two men, quite innocently, fall in love with the same girl, Anne Baxter, and discover this about one another, the antagonism between them deepens. Then they go out to battle. During the tense, terrible raid, they discover each other's virtues and patriotism — and only one man comes back to win the girl.

"Crash Dive" is distinguished above the average "service" picture by its color photography, its strong cast, by its completely accurate details about submarine operation, and also by its sideline humor and pace, particularly in the scenes where Ty is courting Anne, who is the very pretty schoolteacher.

In other words, while its Navy and Commando action are thrilling and nerve-tingling, the story is counterbalanced with humor, charm, and romance, and is blessedly free of any horror or torture sequences. After seeing this, you will be sure that both Miss Baxter and Mr. Andrews are destined to be important stars. James Gleason distinguishes the role of an old-line Navy man, and Ben Carter is very funny as a Negro seaman.

Very worth your while.

EVEN THE Victory Gardens in Hollywood ARE DIFFERENT!

MOVIELAND HAS TAKEN UP VICTORY GARDENING IN JUST AS BIG A WAY AS THE REST OF OUR COUNTRY. BUT DESPITE THE MUCH-DISCUSSED "WIDE, OPEN SPACES" OF THE WEST, MOST MOVIE HOMES HAVEN'T MUCH EXTRA LAND AROUND THEM. SO TENNIS COURTS, PLAY GROUNDS AND ALL SUCH ARE BEING UTILIZED, AND TODAY NO HANDS ARE GLAMOROUS UNLESS THERE'S A BIT OF GOOD EARTH ON THEM!

Jimmy Gleason has one of the finest herb gardens in all California. Jim also raises all vegetables, many fruits, runs a wonderful lath house for seedlings. Incidentally, one of the funniest victory gardens is the majestic white fountain in Guy Kibbee's backyard, surrounded by a bed of onions where petunias once grew.

Here's Fred MacMurray, busy hoeing what used to be his badminton court. (Notice net poles still in the background.) Jack, the setter, oversees the job.

right—MacMurray, the screen lover, busy with the fertilizer. Fred does all his own gardening. Lilly, his wife, has a separate personal vegetable garden. To date, Fred's cabbage is best, but Lilly says she will have more tomatoes than he does. We'll let you know how it all comes out in the fall.

above and to the right—Even the kid stars are going in for dirt. Young Joan Carroll is mighty proud of her cabbage crop (cabbages, most politely, grow the year round in California). Joanie also takes care of a flock of chicks.

This was intended to be the tennis court at Jimmy Cagney's new Coldwater Canyon home. And now look at what James has made it.

Annie Sothern lives right in the busiest section of Beverly Hills, has no space at all for a garden. But that doesn't stop her from doing her bit. Here she is defying the bugs to get at her lone orange tree.

The wives fighting men leave behind them can take over the care of a whole ranch; that is, they can if they've got the kind of sturdy character Lucille Ball possesses. Lucille really does live in the wide, open spaces, so far away from MGM that when she's working, she has to live in town.

Most of us are like Cornel Wilde—when it comes to gardening. We have to make crowded corners do. And like Cornel, we tie up the bean vines in this unorthodox manner, which doesn't matter at all as long as the beans thrive.

Joan Crawford hadn't a spot for vegetable growing until she thought of spading up the round bed that used to hold tuberous begonias. Now it flourishes with enough corn, tomatoes, lettuce, and beans for the household.

Another shot of Lucille Ball's garden. This gives you an idea of the diversity of her crops. She has four dogs she takes care of, too.

When it comes to family gardening, there's no busier group than Dennis Morgan and his small fry. Dennis and Stanley, Jr. work together daily (Dennis' real name, you remember is Stanley Morner) and little sister, Kirsten (named for the great opera singer, Kirsten Flagstad) is delighted to help with the weeding.

THE GROANER

Originally it was Dick Arlen who thus named Bing—or Harry Lillis Crosby, if you prefer. The Bingo has kept that title among his friends ever since. He is the phenomenon of movie business, a canny guy who has never lost his head in the slightest.

He makes movies, records, does his weekly radio stint, broadcasts continually to our boys abroad, oversees his try-out office for new inventions, goes on camp tours, plays championship golf, races his horses and runs an equine breeding farm, lives not only in the midst of his own boisterous family of Dixie and the four boys, but also in the midst of his brothers' families, which are also populated with progeny. For most mortals that would require a sixty hour day, but Bing is never rushed, never nervous. He even persuades people that he is lazy—which proves he's a good actor. His next picture is "Dixie."

GENE TIERNEY TALKS ON SEX

SHE WANTS LESS EXOTIC ROLES ON THE SCREEN, THIS STAR WHO WILL SOON BE A MOTHER

HAVE you ever seen a star raging? Well, I have.

Have you ever heard a star take the witness stand in her own defense and, armed with Exhibits A, B, C, and D, argue that she should be made less alluring on the screen? Well, I have.

The star, Gene Tierney. The court-room, Gene's house one summer afternoon.

Gene, in black and white checked slacks, tan moccasins, white silk shirt, and bright, red temper, used her home as Exhibit A.

"Does this house look like the home of an exotic siren?" she demanded. "This early American type of house, deliberately a bit crude, kind of pioneer, with old gas lamps, geraniums in pots, copper warming pan, and that sort of thing?"

Gene pointed to the antique cobbler's bench. She rubbed her fingers (guiltless of polish, the rather blunt fingertips of a little girl) over the soft-sheened old silver of the Lazy Susan on the plain pine table; she gestured toward the hooked rugs and the bright chintzes and comfy chairs. "Does all this," she wanted to know, "suggest the lair of a—a dame?"

Gene said, "I have a flannel nightgown with long sleeves. When I wear it, I put my hair in pigtails. My husband says, 'You look cuter in that than you do in those drapey things.'

"That says it for me, in a dozen words. That sums up for the defense. For what I'm getting at is this: Don't you think they misunderstand sex in Hollywood? Don't they make it too obvious? When a flannel nightgown and pigtails light flares in a man's eyes, why must I wear a sarong and go up to the camera looking like this," (Gene squinted her eyes to Oriental slits, leered horribly) "in order to be seductive?

"I don't mind being sexy at all. No girl does. I don't like being exotic, bedizened. For if you have sex appeal, you can be dressed in a little tailored suit, and the sex appeal will still be evident. If you've really got sex appeal, you can be sexy in a—a raincoat. What I hate is to read every script and find myself in a bathing suit or six beads."

Miss T. then inched me into her bedroom, stood back while I took in the wallpaper, a design of scarlet and purple flowers, fat and old-fashioned; the furniture, marble-topped tables and what-nots; the family daguerreotypes.

"Is this," she asked, reasonably, "your idea of the boudoir of a DuBarry? Or does it look as though a girl from Fairfield, Connecticut, sleeps here?"

She dove into her wardrobe, rose to the surface with a pair of navy blue shoes, flat of heel, blunt of toe, somewhat scuffed (Clodhoppers, her husband Oleg calls them) in one hand; a bouquet of cotton dresses,

★ We wouldn't fool you. Gene isn't stirring up a thing in that kettle except perhops a little controversy. However, this does show a bit of the Tierney-Cassini living room.

★ The home-maker hot stuff type, dusting on old grandfather clock. Note the wedding ring prominently displayed. Her newest movie, incidentally, is "Heaven Can Wait."

★ On the Tierney allure version, this, the kitchen type of come-hither. Regard, please, Miss Tierney not trying to preserve that super-duper figure—not with that oat-meal she has.

★ Tierney version—a shot of Gene in her chintz covered bed, she herself wearing pigtails and a flannel nightie, high of neck, long of sleeve. This is the real Miss T, says she.

★ Gene insists you can be a lady and be alluring, and this gentle needle-woman-at-home shot wins the argument. This is something for a fellow to come home to.

short-waisted, full-skirted, starchy, in the other.

"If I were a vamp, very smooth," she adjured me, "would I wear shoes and frocks like these? Not likely. But I do wear them, almost always, at home.

"The fact is, I have a terrible time trying to look very smooth when, for premieres and things, I must. I look at Loretta Young, Irene Dunne, Claudette Colbert, sleek, every hair in place, and I envy them. It takes the combined efforts of a hairdresser and an entire wardrobe department to get me to look like that. And even then the effect doesn't last long. I relapse into that casual look in no time at all.

"I'm scared to death when I go to a party, very much afraid of people, really. To cover up, I put on a terrific act. I thought I got away with it until Oleg, undeceived, told me it was very young of me.

"My husband calls me 'Potato' in French. In French, English, or Arabic, it still means potato. Which does not mean 'Passion Flower' or any other hothouse exotic. It serves to indicate that Oleg does not think he wedded Delilah.

"My mother often says, 'You represent nothing but bread and milk.'

"Vic Mature was talking with Oleg one day. Speaking of Rita Hayworth, Vic said, 'Rita is the frail, ethereal type. Now, Gene is the peasant type.' Oleg wanted to make something of it, you know, on that usual male basis of any other man daring to say I was less than perfect. But I was very pleased.

"I can get washed and dressed in fifteen minutes flat—and I do mean washed. Which should be a telling point in my defense of myself as a hearty, healthy, twenty-two-year-old gal, and not a lacquered siren. For sirens, it seems to me, always look uncommonly unwashed.

"I like wood fires and babies and milk toast and garden flowers and penny candy and cold showers and spare ribs and sentimental poetry. I even write poetry, very sentimental, not Swinburne at all. It is usually about the kind of things I don't understand.

"Oleg says that is also very young of me. There are a great many things I don't understand. But to see me on the screen, you would suppose I had forgotten more things, all pallid and poisonous, than most women will ever know.

"I met a very charming woman in Washington, D.C., not long ago. She said, 'I'm so glad to meet you, and to see that you are not a half-breed.'

"Every time someone meets me for the first time, their eyes bug, their jaws drop. 'But this is too funny,' they say. 'You are not an exotic, you're a kid. Don't they know that, out in Hollywood?'

"Such nice people don't get it. What is more, I don't get it. Why me as a strip-tease artist, a sloe-eyed young degenerate (see 'Shanghai Gesture') a snare and a delusion on a silken couch on the burning sands of the desert (see 'Sundown') a girl with her heart in the right place but camouflaged by a sarong (see 'Son of Fury')—why me?"

Gene led the way back to the wood-panelled living room. She sat, tailor fashion (a most unsirenesque pose) on the capacious, chintz covered couch. She whipped her hair back of her ears, an insouciant, very careless, very young gesture. She said:

"The burden of my grief, the theme of my sad, sad story is this: having played parts such as I did in 'Shanghai Gesture,' 'Sundown,' and most of the others, I am afraid I will never be thought of for parts like—like—well, for such a part as Jennifer Jones is playing in 'The Song of Bernadette.' That picture is being made right on my own lot, and they wouldn't even test me for it. They didn't refuse to test me for it—worse, they never even thought of testing me. And it is—this is what worries me—the kind of part that, unless you play it when you are very young . . . you never can. And I could play such parts, believe me, I could play them. I want to play them. It isn't that the parts I've had were not swell parts; some of them, most especially that in 'Tobacco Road,' strong, dramatic parts; many of them exciting; most of them decorative. But it is a funny thing, a very funny thing that on the stage in New York I should have played school-girl types, dressed in low heels and sweaters, yet when I came to Hollywood, played sirens, Shanghai Gestures, dames . . .

"I keep wondering, why me? Until I came to Hollywood, no one —no one thought of me as—as sequins and sin.

"It was such a short while ago, only a little more than two years, actually, that just out of school, I was traveling in California with my family. We visited the studios, like any other tourists. A cousin of mine, Gordon Hollingshead of Warner Brothers Studios, took us around that lot. A couple of directors asked him who I was. You know how relatives are. 'Just a little cousin,' he told them, his manner slightly apologetic. One of them suggested I make a test. My brother Butch overhearing this said, 'Awww!' That's what the folks thought of me.

"Why, gosh," she said, as unexotically as ever was, "I was still at the stage then where I collected pictures of Loretta Young, my favorite that year. And I wrote a note to Katharine Hepburn, I remember. 'I know it doesn't mean anything to you,' I said (how truly) 'but I think you are a great actress.'

"When, somewhat against his better judgment, as he made quite clear, my cousin Gordon introduced me to the casting director at Warners', that harassed gentleman gave me the lackluster eye, said patiently, 'Yes, she's a little cutie.' Whereupon my mother gave me the signal and flounced me out of there, remarking testily, 'A gentleman doesn't call a young lady a little cutie.'

"When they called me back, two days later, asked me to make a test and suggested that I try to look a little older by wearing a black dress, Mother and I had to buy one. I'd never worn black before. The test made, we went on to San Francisco, thinking nothing more than that it was a great lark to have made a movie test; something to tell the kids back in Fairfield.

"And when after they had made the test, the studio called me in San Francisco, asked me to come back, sign a contract, join their stock company, my father told me I must go home first and make my debut, as planned.

"Which, without it occurring to me to rebel, I did. Such a gal as I played in 'Shanghai Gesture,' I further submit, so bad, so full of vice, or even the shot-bang character I played as 'Belle Starr' would not meekly, and as a matter of course, obey Papa.

"As added testimony to my naivete, having met Bette Davis and Errol Flynn, briefly, the day we first visited Warner Brothers Studios, and having heard that they were to be in the East, I invited them to my debut which took place at the Fairfield County Country Club.

"They didn't come, of course. But they wrote me charming notes of regret and as their names appeared on the guest list printed in the Fairfield paper, there were certainly no refusals! I copied the dress I wore at my coming-out party, by the way, from one, the flouncy one, Bette Davis wore in 'Jezebel.'

"My very first part on the stage was that of a wide-eyed immigrant girl in the George Abbott production, 'Mrs. O'Brien Entertains.' The play was a quick fade. But no one, certainly, seemed to think I was miscast. All the notices were simply swell for me. So swell that I committed some of them to memory. Richard Watts, for example, wrote, 'Nothing worthwhile in "Mrs. O'Brien Entertains" except a young girl named Gene Tierney.'

"Later, the critics who flattened my ears back when I did 'Shanghai Gesture' and 'Sundown,' came out when I made 'Rings On Her Toes' and said, 'Believe it or not, Gene Tierney is very good.' This seems to tie in with, and strengthen, my case. For while that part of the gum-chewing girl who works in a department store was not exactly the wistful, ethereal part I'd like to play, at least I was young, and wore regular clothes.

"It was while I was playing in 'Mrs. O'Brien' that the studios began to offer me contracts. Columbia made the highest bid, three hundred and fifty a week, so I took it. Mother and I came to Hollywood, and I tested for a part in 'Primrose Path' which starred Ginger Rogers. They signed me, and then I sat for six months. Know why? Because, they said, I looked too young for the part. Other parts came up. Same objection. One, I recall, was for a picture in which I was to play the love interest with Ralph Bellamy. 'He looks more like your father,' I was told, 'than your beau.'

"Why, even when I was making 'Sundown,' they kept complaining, 'Can't you look a little more mature?' They even took pains to make my voice more seductive. I 'took pains,' too, I might add. For the means to this exotic end was in the form of a trainer brought to the studio and paid his salary for punching me in the midriff, making me go 'eeee-ahhh-eeee' until my voice gave the desired effect of smoking up from my tummy.

"When my mother saw the picture in New York, people laughed when I made these queer noises. They were not supposed to laugh, and Mother was highly indignant. They were making fun, she feared, of her daughter's dramatic ability. They were, indeed. I must say I couldn't believe it was me when I went to see the picture. Especially did I seem a stranger to myself when I lay on the satin couch on the desert. That dame!

"Having sat out my contract with Columbia, George Abbott asked me to come back to New York, and put me in the play, 'Ring Two.' Betty Field was in the play, too. Again I was cast as a girl of approximately my own age and type. Again the notices were better than good. After that, I was in the hit play, 'The Male Animal,' but left the cast after four months to sign with Twentieth Century-Fox.

"Before the contract was signed, I made a test in New York. Originally intended to be just a photographic test, the director asked me if I could 'break into a scene,' if I knew anything by heart. 'Of course I do,' I said—and did that lovely innocent girl in 'Our Town.' The point being, I had my choice of anything I wanted to do, and that was what I gravitated to, naturally; that was the kind of thing I wanted to do, felt equipped to do. It is the kind of thing I still want to do. As proof, it seems to me, that I did not miscast myself, the test director was more than enthusiastic. In fact, he told my father, 'This is the first girl's test I've ever really wept over.'

"I started out with the idea that I was going places on the screen. Nice places, in a nice way. I started out with good notices when I played young girls on the stage. I don't want my name to be synonymous with sex bedizened with sequins and spangles. I want to be a good girl on the screen. I want to be wistful, ethereal, idealistic. I want to be my age. I want to be young. There is plenty of time for me to be exotic when I am thirty.

"Where on the road have I left the thing I was going to be?"

MOVIE STARS ARE FANS . . . TOO

Eleanor Powell has always admired the great musician and conductor, Arturo Toscanini. When a couple of years ago she heard that Toscanini was visiting the MGM lot, she was beside herself with excitement. Then her heart sank. Undoubtedly he would ask only to meet the great singing stars.

On the fatal day, while she was practicing a ballet number on an empty sound stage, she looked up and saw Toscanini watching her. Her heart almost missed a beat. She was afraid he'd go away, and she'd never get a chance to speak to him. But he didn't go away.

Instead, when she finished her number Toscanini said, "That was beautiful. Will you make for me now the dance with the noise?"

Quickly Eleanor took off her ballet slippers and put on tap dancing ones. And she did a tap dance, every step of which was a way of expressing her admiration for Toscanini. When she had finished, he kissed her on both cheeks and invited her to have dinner with him.

UNEXPECTED INHERITANCE

You often read about the fabulous gifts movie stars give, but seldom is it when you hear of fabulous gifts given to movie stars.

Still they do happen.

Academy Award winner Jimmy Cagney has a soft spot in his Irish heart for trotting horses, and he owns about six beauties. Jimmy keeps them on his farm in Martha's Vineyard.

The other day he was notified that he had inherited four more trotting horses. It seems that Jimmy knew, slightly, a very elderly woman who kept trotting horses and raced them at the same fairs that Jimmy did his. Although they knew each other to nod to, that was the extent of the friendship. However, in her will the old lady said she was leaving her valuable horses to James Cagney, because he would love them like his own and appreciate their fine blood.

ANNA LEE—TIME OUT FOR VICTORY

Screen star Anna Lee walked into the Hollywood Victory Committee offices and announced that she wanted to interrupt her picture career to devote six months to entertaining soldiers, sailors, and marines through USO camp shows.

That much of the story was published, but the entire story is so fine it deserves to be told completely.

Miss Lee had, a half hour before, flatly turned down a contract for three pictures in order to give her time to the entertainment of our boys. The part offered her in "Iron Major," which stars Pat O'Brien, would have been the fattest role of her career.

"Joe E. Brown's statements that the soldiers need entertainment sold me on my six-month offer," Miss Lee told the Victory Committee. "Some two thousand players in Hollywood are signing pledges to donate six weeks of their time to this necessary cause. I want to go them one better. My time is your time for the next six months."

The Victory Committee forthwith put her on a train for Austin, Texas, where she sold bonds by the hundred thousands. On her return, she found a USO camp show route awaiting her, one which may eventually carry her around the world.

"I'd like to go to Guadalcanal, to North Africa, or wherever they want to send me," were Anna Lee's parting words.

WHAT THEY'RE TALKING ABOUT

TOWN TOPICS: Olivia de Havilland has found a new love, and don't let anyone tell you that it isn't so. Captain John Huston is consoling himself with Simone Simon (that old consoler) but Olivia has bound herself to some gentleman in khaki, even if he doesn't have officer's bars . . . Andy Devine is studying celestial navigation, even if they would have a hard time finding a ship to fit him in. Andy has worked long and hard to get himself into a position to take care of his family while he is gone and is working hard to get himself a post of some kind. Can't you just hear that gravel voice sending messages? . . . Best Opportunity of the Month: That of Vaughn Monroe getting the leading part opposite Lucille Ball in "Meet the People." The handsome band leader is taking coaching lessons like mad and he can count on all the help from blonde Lucy who had a hard time starting in movieland herself . . . Shirley Temple, age fifteen, has picked herself a lovelight in her eyes. He is a Nob Hill socialite from San Francisco. However, Shirley's parents will take her East to do a show, with rehearsals starting in early September, so the baron of Nob Hill may have to forget the curly top unless "still waters run deep."

VICTORY COMMITTEE MEETING

As seen by Movieland's staff photographer, Nat Dallinger. The meeting was really a clearing house affair to decide camp programs and who was going where.

Why producers have a fine life. Here Harry Cohn, the dynamic head of Columbia pictures, finds himself entirely surrounded by Rita Hayworth, Janet Blair, and Anita Louise.

Swell guy Jimmy Cagney welcomes swell actor Clarence Muse to the Victory Committee meeting. Andy Devine looks on.

COBINA BEAMS AND TRACY TWIRLS—EVERYBODY HAPPY

Cobina Wright, Jr., is the happiest girl in town. She is going to have a baby in October and just goes around movieland with a beaming smile and cheery look, knowing that even if they send her Palmer Beaudette overseas, she still will have "something to remind her" soon.

Arthur Murray Report: Spencer Tracy is a fine dancer, but after years of neglecting the ballroom, Spencer has to do a scene in "A Guy Named Joe" with Irene Dunne. Hence Spence right now twirls a mean tootsie under the expert Murray supervision. Also Wallace Beery has become a threat to the Latin bands. He learned to tango in five lessons and twirls and twirls. Bad men are the strangest people!

NO COMPLAINT DEPARTMENT

Pretty Mary Beth Hughes and Ted North just have been married, culminating a courtship of over two years. The two met when they were both virtual unknowns on the Twentieth Century-Fox movie lot. Mary Beth went to stardom, and Ted just kept getting small roles in small pictures; however the romance kept on. Then Ted was introduced into the Army and after a few months was given an honorable discharge. Now they are married, and Ted is at last promised leading roles at his studio. Mary Beth has signed up with Pine-Thomas, so all is very fine.

COULD IT HAPPEN TO YOU?

Hollywood's Good Deed For The Day Department: On the RKO lot for the past year, a youngster named Russell Wade has been under contract. He gets a small salary, and because of this, whenever he was up for a part, studio biggies would say, "Oh, let's get someone a little higher priced" and out would go Russell's chances.

One day, through a series of freak accidents, Russell was given a rather good part in "Bombardier." Director Bob Wallace liked his work and wanted to slate him for the part of John Garfield's brother in "The Fallen Sparrow." Garfield wanted him, too, but the biggies still said he wasn't good enough and refused to allow Wallace to test him.

So Wallace, nice guy that he is, gave Russell the part of a flower peddler in the picture, shot the sequence the first day and then ran the rushes for the producers. They liked the boy and wanted to sign him at the studio—figuring he was just an extra.

Result of Wallace's time and trouble—Russ has the second biggest part in "The Fallen Sparrow," plays a good part in the latest "Gildersleeve" and has a fine role in "The Leopard Man."

THE FOREIGN DEPARTMENT SHOOTS TROUBLE

Speaking of "The Fallen Sparrow," troubles are looming again because of the position of our Foreign Department in the matter of Spain.

The script calls for John Garfield to play the part of a Spanish Loyalist whom the Gestapo chase to New York, attempting to murder the boy for political reasons. Because it ties up Spain with Germany, the Foreign Department is screaming that some way has to be found to separate the two things. Auctioning of the script in Chicago to raise funds for the benefit of the United States armed forces was canceled as being "an unfriendly gesture."

Sam Wood's "For Whom the Bell Tolls" was released after the words Fascist and Loyalists were omitted and the words Nationalists and Republicans substituted. But "The Fallen Sparrow" problem isn't so simple.

CANTEEN DAZE

It's a lad in blue who pilots that Blue Angel, Marlene Dietrich.

Remember Harry Langdon? He draws portraits almost nightly at the Hollywood Canteen.

Out in the Canteen kitchen Joan Fontaine and Brian Aherne uncomplainingly do k.p. duty.

Mrs. Irving Berlin, Mrs. Ginger Rogers Briggs, Mrs. Basil Rathbone busying with sandwiches.

DO YOU WONDER WHEN YOU LOOK AT THESE PICTURES THAT THE HOLLYWOOD CANTEEN IS SO PACKED NIGHTLY THAT THEY HAVE TO LET THE BOYS IN IN SHIFTS? NOT ALL THESE STARS APPEARED ANY ONE NIGHT—BUT THESE PICTURES COVER ONLY ABOUT TWO WEEKS OF ATTENDANCE, WHICH GIVES YOU A ROUGH IDEA.

Two beards and both of them real, Monty Wooley's which he wears all the time, and Walter Pidgeon's which Pidge is wearing only for "Madame Curie."

Above—Ladeees and gentlemen, behold the most beautiful k.p.'s ever seen, Miss Hedy Lamarr and Mr. John Loder busily engaged in scalding a few cups and saucers. We promised a few months back to report to you on how this romance was going. Report: it's going along smoother than a Harry James' trumpet solo, and that is a mighty smooth thing, brother. As a matter of fact, they're married.

Deanna Durbin and a sergeant beam back and forth at one another on the dance floor.

The gal that really slays them here and everywhere is Kate Smith.

Beautify Your FORM Contour

Don't be embarrassed by a flat, undeveloped or sagging bust. Do as thousands of other women just like yourself are doing. They have learned how to bring out the loveliest contours of their figures, whatever their bust faults. Now you, too, can do the same . . . safely, easily and positively.

HIGHLY ENDORSED BY MANY DOCTORS

Your flat bustline can be miraculously beautified into full and alluring contours. Or, if you are the pendulous type, it can be rounded into high and youthful loveliness. All you have to do is follow the easy directions on exercise, massage, brassieres, diet, etc., given in the great medically-endorsed book, "The Complete Guide to Bust Culture." Adopt these simple, self-help measures at once and your bust will positively appear full, firm and shapely . . . the proud glamorous curves which make you more desirable than ever.

INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

HOW CAN A MAN WIN?

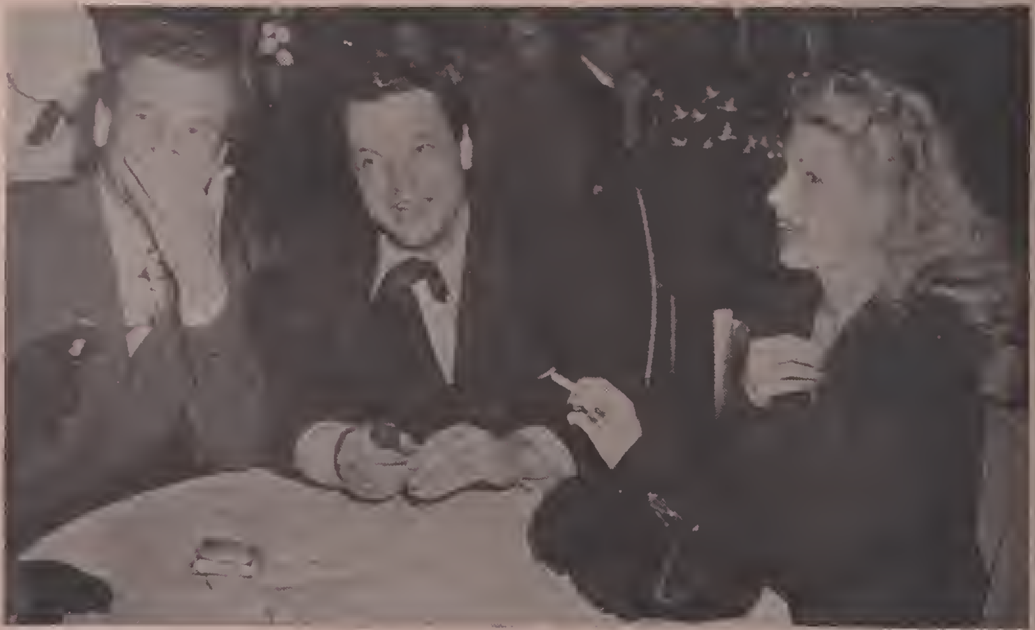
Actors are always praying for a "break," hoping for a "long term contract." But there are times when both those things coming along together can be bad luck, too.

There are three examples of it around Hollywood right now, Joseph Cotten, Alan Marshall, and Jack Beutel. The former two are under long-term contracts to David O. Selznick, the latter under a seven-yearer to Howard Hughes. All three are in great demand. Likewise all three are not being loaned by their respective producers.

Cotten has two terrific performances out right now in two very different pictures, "Shadow of a Doubt" and "Journey into Fear." With the leading man shortage what it is, every studio is clamoring for his services, and money is no object. However, Selznick refuses to lend him. Since David is not in production right now, Cotten can do nothing but collect his nominal Selznick salary and just sit, while acting plums go to performers much less able and much older than he.

Marshall, who looks as handsome and romantic as a young Ronald Colman, has done nothing since the unlamented "Lydia" nearly two years ago. There is some talk of his being sent to England to co-star with Vivian Leigh in a picture to be made over there, but that is still in the talking stage.

As for young Jack Beutel, he still has four years to go on his Howard Hughes contract. But since he has just recently gone into the Navy, it is possible that he may never be seen at all.



This is what you've read about on page 12—Rita Hayworth and Orson Welles out together. Only when we snapped them, they weren't alone. That's Joseph Cotten to the left, and to the left of him was Mrs. Cotten, who missed our lens.

IMPORTANT!

This is not a cheap undependable storm glass. The Weatherman Weather House is the original "Swiss" Weather House which actually tells you the weather in advance. Beware of Imitations.

ALL WEATHER FORECASTS DISCONTINUED FOR THE DURATION—BUT DON'T WORRY—

Since our Government has banned weather forecasts and temperature reports many folks have had to buy expensive barometers to forecast the weather. Why pay $5 or $10 for a barometer when you can predict the weather yourself, at home, 8 to 24 hours in advance, with this accurate, inexpensive Weather House forecaster? It's made like a little Swiss cottage, with a thatched green roof and small green shutters. Inside the house is an old witch and a little boy and girl. When the weather's going to be fine, the little boy and girl come out in front. But when bad weather is on the way the old witch makes an appearance. There is an easy-to-read thermometer on the front of the cottage that shows you the exact temperature. You can depend on knowing the condition of the weather from eight to twenty-four hours in advance with this Weather House, made in the U. S. A. . . . Everyone—business men, housewives, teachers, farmers, school boys and girls, laborers, doctors, lawyers, ministers, clubs and colleges can now predict the weather in advance. Here is positively the most amazing introductory advertising offer ever made. But you must act quickly—prices may rise.

In ten more minutes what will you be doing?

IN TEN MORE MINUTES they'll be in action—American fighters risking life and limb to conquer one more bridgehead on the road to freedom.

And in ten more minutes—what will you be doing to help win this war?

Because it's up to you as much as it's up to them. Unless you—and all the rest of us at home—are devoting every spare minute of our time to fighting this war as civilians, their chances of victory are slim.

Next time you read of an American raid on enemy positions—with its tragic footnote of lost planes and ships and men—ask yourself:

"What more can I do today for freedom? What more can I do tomorrow that will save the lives of men like this and help them win the war?"

To help you find your place in America's War for Freedom, the Government has organized the Citizens Service Corps as part of local Defense Councils. Probably there is one of these Corps operating now in your community. Give it your full co-operation. If none exists, help organize one.

Write to this magazine for a free booklet, "You and the War," telling you what to do and how to do it. This is your war. Help win it. Choose what you will do now!

Virginia Weidler who occupies a drawing room in our leonine heart keeps moving onward and upward, carrying on where she left off in "Philadelphia Story" and "The Youngest Profession" plus music.

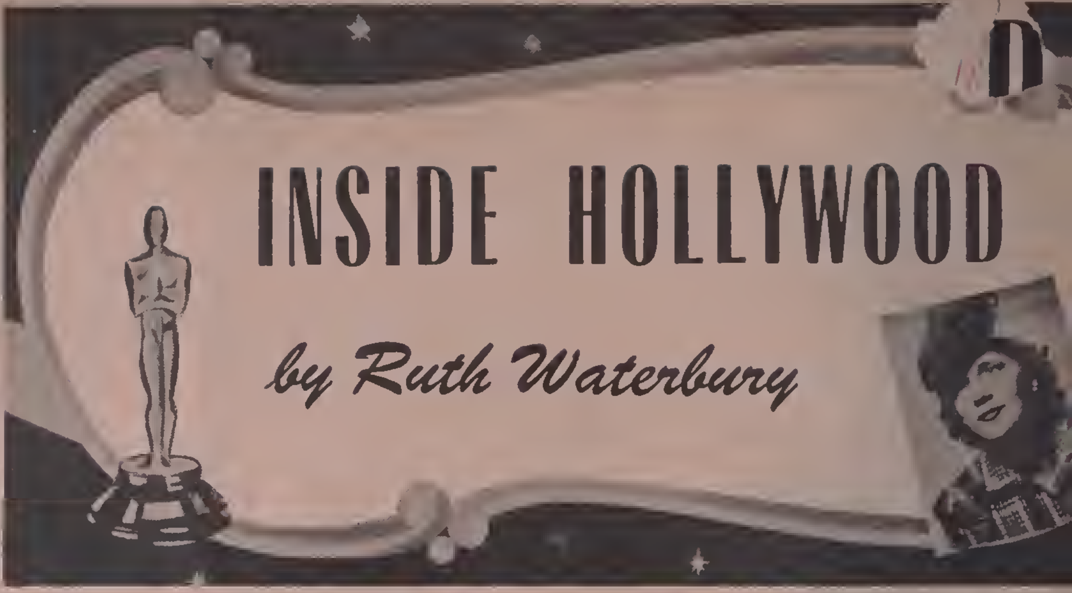
IN TECHNICOLOR

It's the picture that was picked for a WORLD PREMIERE at Broadway's famed ASTOR Theatre, scene of the screen's greatest hits!

Recording an important moment in Hollywood history: Miss Shirley Temple, now fifteen, affixes her signature to a contract with David O. Selznick, that fine producer and demon star maker who has done all right with the careers of Joan Fontaine, Ingrid Bergman, Jennifer Jones, and Joseph Cotten. Shirley's first "grown up" picture is "Since You Went Away."

Movieland's staff photographer, Nat Dallinger, stops a recently married couple on the floor at Ciro's. He's the only photographer who was present with his camera at the Sterling-Sothern wedding. See pictures on page 24 of this issue.

Surprise twosome of the month: Ann Sheridon and George Raft cutting up on the Mocambo floor. That's something!



INSIDE HOLLYWOOD

by Ruth Waterbury

THE SADDEST MAN ABOUT TOWN

These evenings it's Helmut Dantine, now that his marriage to Gwen Anderson has broken up.

When newly-married Gwen Anderson went into the Broadway play, "Janie," neither she nor Helmut expected the show to have much of a run. Neither did Helmut expect to be kept working so busily by Warners' that frequent trips to New York would be impossible.

Even as it was, Helmut did rush to New York at every opportunity. Sometimes he had only time for a few hours with his wife as a reward for the six-thousand-mile journey, made under the discomforts of wartime.

Twice "Janie" threatened to close, and on those occasions Dantine was very happy. But it didn't close. Miss Anderson became steadily more important theatrically, just as Helmut rose in the movie world.

When the divorce rumors first began circulating, Helmut hotly denied them. His few but close friends believe that he himself did not want to believe them.

Like the Raft-Grable situation, here again it's the man who's carrying the torch.

Still Helmut is very handsome, and there are some thousand-odd beautiful young things about Hollywood very eager to console him.

VERY SAD NEWS

Teresa Wright, having given up her role in "North Star" for motherhood, now isn't going to have her baby after all.

She's being very wonderful and brave about it all, and the whole heart of Hollywood has gone out to her.

IT'S THE SAME EVERYWHERE

Just as in every town in America, the war cuts more deeply into Hollywood life with every passing day.

Each month finds more established male players gone into the service . . . currently George Montgomery, Glenn Ford, and Cesar Romero have left . . . and a few returning.

Hollywood's first war hero, Craig Reynolds, who never got quite started on the screen despite his handsomeness, comes back from Guadalcanal . . . Craig is invalided back under his true name of Hugh Enfield, Captain Hugh Enfield of the Marines, and marries Barbara Pepper, who looks very naughty on screen, and who is actually very nice . . .

Frank Albertson gets an honorable discharge from the Army, signs a new contract with Paramount, and marries Grace Gillern with whom he's been in love for some time . . . Huntz Hall, of the Dead End Kids, is dropped by Uncle Sam because of bad eyesight, while in the Army young Bill Orr gets his lieutenant's bars.

In our town, just as in your town, the baby boom is on . . . Gene Tierney settles down in a small Kansas

"HEAVEN CAN WAIT" ★ "SONG OF BERNADETTE" ★ "JANE EYRE"

Surprise shot of the month: Those ex-es, Judy Garland and David Rose, appear on the dance floor together. But they don't look happy—and they were not happy. Each was out with someone else, Judy with Van Johnson, Dave with a blonde.

On the set of "Wintertime" Cornel Wilde gives Ruth Waterbury some autographs for visiting soldier boys. Wearing a deep yellow makeup to make him appear tanned, Cornel said, "Don't let those guys see me. They'll think I'm a Japanese spy."

Gail Patrick and Freeman Gosden (of Amos and Andy fame) say they are not married. Many of their closest friends insist that they are, nevertheless.

town, so that she can be near Oleg Cassini, her husband, when her baby is born, and insists that she is going to live on Oleg's corporal's pay the while . . .

On occasional evenings you may find quite a few stars out in the night clubs (as witness page 72 in this issue) but, by and large, our nicest people . . . like the nicest people in your town . . . are staying home quietly, tending their Victory Gardens, raising their children . . .

However, some characters do not change . . . nothing apparently can change them . . . they remain amusingly, even annoyingly, themselves . . . as for example, Miss Veronica Lake . . . or for another example, Bruce Cabot . . . or for a third, Howard Hughes, the millionaire movie maker . . .

VERONICA LAKE AND HER SECOND BABY

This is hardly violent enough news to blow your hat off, but the manner of Miss Lake's breaking it to her studio is a story all in itself and magnificently characteristic of her.

Miss Lake was midway in production on "Sullavan's Travels" when she told Paramount about the expected arrival of her first baby.

This was more than a shock to the Paramount officials. They didn't even like the idea of their pocket Venus being married, much less a mother. Besides, it costs a mint of money to shoot a movie around a girl and conceal her figure throughout every foot of film. However, there was nothing else they could do, in this case, but they decided to guard against the future. When they renewed Miss Lake's contract, they wrote in a clause regarding her having to go off salary for several months prior to the event if she should again essay motherhood.

Thus a few months ago she was cast in "The Hour Before The Dawn." Ronnie looked a bit plump, whereupon a few of her closer studio friends asked her a couple of blunt questions.

"For heaven's sake, no," said Veronica.

The picture went into production, and Veronica got plumper. The newspapers began asking questions, the cast began asking questions. To one and all Veronica gave the same reply.

"I am not going to have a baby," said Veronica.

It wasn't until she was so deeply into the role that she couldn't be dropped without a cost of several hundred thousand dollars, that she told the truth.

The baby is due to arrive about the time you read this.

WHEN IT COMES TO BRUCE CABOT . . .

When he's from the Army, he's up to his old romantic routine. Still Errol Flynn's closest friend, he spent his entire recent furlough in the company of Annie Sheridan, always holding Ann's hand hotly in his, always dancing looking deeply into her eyes.

Annie was right in there pitching, too, but from the looks of other events it didn't mean a thing in her newly gay life. For the week before Bruce was in town, she was everywhere with Cully Richards, and the week after Bruce left, she was quite a few places with, of all people, George Raft. That is, except for the evening that she was out with no less a personage than George Brent, her ex, who is still visibly carrying a torch tall enough to knock him over.

AS FOR HOWARD HUGHES . . .

He has got around to Ava Gardner. Or vice versa.

That actually makes me sad to see. There is no more beautiful young creature in the movie colony than Ava. She and the Mick made such a cute couple. They were young and enthusiastic together.

Now Mr. Hughes is a distinguished human being. He's rich, he's charming, he can fly like Jimmy Doolittle. (I suppose it is his nearly total deafness that bars him from service.) But he consistently for the past fifteen years or so has dated

MR. LUCKY (RKO Radio)

Somewhere in the middle of this, a good idea got lost. The basic plot concerns a professional gambler who rather than be drafted adopts a dead man's name and card. Penniless, he decides to fleece a bunch of silly society women out of the money they are assembling for a war charity. He calls in his henchman, stages his crooked games, birdcages and the like, only to have his better nature get in his own way, when he falls for the prettiest society girl of the outfit.

Cary Grant labors hard to make this both exciting and romantic. Laraine Day is very chill but pretty as the girl. It is good entertainment most of the way, but not up to the standard that you associate with the Grant name.

HITLER'S MADMAN

This is the story of Lidice, the Czechoslovakian town murdered by the henchmen of Heydrich, Nazi "Protector" of the country.

It is too bad that such a subject, which could have been made into an immortal motion picture, was made into such a poor one. The acting is bad, the direction worse, and the dialogue so unnatural that it would not convince a child.

Alan Curtis and Patricia Morison provide the love interest, John Carradine does what he can with the role of Heydrich, and such worthy actors as Edgar Kennedy and Ralph Morgan are completely unconvincing.

TWO TICKETS TO LONDON

A train wreck, somewhere in England, proves the means of escape for an American seaman trying to give the slip to the police. On the same train there's a beautiful girl whom the seaman takes along as a hostage.

That's the basic situation of this exciting adventure melodrama, which gets into romantic and hazardous complications before its very satisfactory conclusion.

Alan Curtis, giving far and away his best screen performance to date, and Michele Morgan play the couple, and the remainder of the cast—such worthies as C. Aubrey Smith, Barry Fitzgerald, Dooley Wilson, and Laurence Olivier's young son, Tarquin, ably support them.

THE KANSAN

Harry Sherman, that producer of swift action, outdoor epics, ladles out another honey in "The Kansan." It's as uncomplex and as pure as peppermint stick candy, but if you go for cops and robbers on horseback, you'll enjoy this mightily.

Into a little sagebrush town rides one John Bonniwell, a handsome guy with a quick trigger finger. He keeps the James boys from robbing the local bank, even though he has to go to the hospital after the fray. There, to his surprise, he discovers he's been elected town marshal. When he's up and well again, he realizes there's something very crooked about the town boss, and he sets out to uncover this villainy and give the townspeople peace and order.

Richard Dix plays the worthy John. Albert Dekker is the no-good smoothie. Victor Jory is excellent as a sacrificing brother, and Jane Wyatt is the charming heroine.

EVERY WOMAN IN A VITAL CIVILIAN JOB IS A SOLDIER IN THIS WAR!

Every day, hundreds of men are leaving important civilian jobs to join the Nation's Armed Forces. In their places, women are "carrying on"... doing work that must be done to keep America's war program going at top speed.

These women are soldiers, too... doing their bit by doing a job that is helping America win the war.

And like so many of their "buddies" in khaki and blue, these busy soldiers on the vital home-front find delicious Beech-Nut Gum helps rest and refresh them while they work.

Naturally, the needs of the men and women in the Armed Forces come first of all. So, if your dealer's supply of Beech-Nut Gum is short at times, we know you will understand the reason why.

The need for women to replace men in necessary civilian jobs of all kinds is an unusual opportunity for patriotic women everywhere to serve their country. Investigate at your nearest U. S. Employment Service office . . . even though you have never worked before!

MOVIELAND SUCCESS STORY

When Michele Morgan married handsome Bill Marshall, everyone in Hollywood raised their eyebrows. The vivacious Michele could have had her pick of any of the top glamour boys in town at the time, and yet she picked the relatively unknown actor, without a job at the time. She was in a difficult spot with her career, and everyone said it would hurt her box office appeal to marry.

It is now nearly a year. Michele and Bill have moved out of the small apartment he rented for them; they have a beautiful home in Beverly Hills; she is doing two pictures practically at the same time. He has a contract with Twentieth and will have time to do about two pictures before he is called into the Air Corps.

Here are two people who dared to defy all movieland set rules and marry for love, and it has paid dividends.

Incidentally, all Bill wants to take to the service with him is a certain picture he carries in his wallet, carefully covered with cellophane. It is a picture of him kissing his bride on the steps of the First Methodist Church in Hollywood, right after their wedding.

Dinah Shore steps up from the dance floor to ladle out some of her dreamy tunes at the Hollywood Canteen.

IDA COULDN'T TALK

Ida Lupino was one of the momentarily relaxed war wives in Hollywood recently when she received word that Capt. Louis Hayward of the Marines had arrived safely overseas. Ida had heard no word from him for almost five weeks, and the news of his safe arrival permitted her to deal firmly with the gossip accompanying her mysterious trip to San Diego just that long ago.

The gabbers gabbled that Ida had really planned to go to Mexico to seek a divorce, but changed her mind at the last moment. The story started when Ida had interrogated Ann Sheridan on obtaining a divorce in Mexico.

In denying the whole thing, Ida said, "Yes, I talked to Ann Sheridan at length about Mexico. I'm a diabolically curious person, and Louis and I want to own a ranch in Mexico. But my real reason for being in San Diego was to spend a few last hours with my husband. I was sworn to military secrecy, so I had to let the rumors run rampant until now."

Randy Scott's newest date is very new Ella Raines, who is his leading woman in "Corvettes in Action" at Universal.

LETTER FROM A SOLDIER

The strangest love letters in movieland are those sent to Mrs. Will Price, whom you know as Maureen O'Hara. They are filled with instructions on how the garden should be planted, the roses trimmed; and the last one from Marine Officer Candidate Price ended, "You should put a new row of carrots in every other week. It is time to replace the two rows of peas with squash—you can store this during the winter. Love, darling, and let me know how the tuberous begonias are standing the heat. Will."

FURLOUGH FROM ACTION

Captain Gene Raymond, on furlough from overseas with the Army Air Force Combat Command after almost a year, took a brief flyer into town. Outside of a sharp, serious look in his eye, a few deep but attractive lines in his face, a crisp, military manner of speech; and an almost complete absenteeism of his personable grin, Gene hadn't changed much. The gentleman had seen and been through plenty of action, but had little to say on the subject, except that the boys "over there" can use plenty of letters from home and all the nice shining equipment that comes from bond buying.

RKO studio chiefs made it plain that they were keeping Gene's dressing room lights there burning brightly for him, and all the execs brought out their best cigars at the reception tendered him.

EDITOR'S NOTE: On account of Movieland believes there is a whole new world opening up in movies—the world of living music—we are herewith starting a new department.

It used to be Broadway and Tin Pan Alley that dominated the music business. Today it's Hollywood and the Big Bands on tour, in the movie houses, and on the radio. Tin Pan Alley has moved West, and the best tunes of all don't come from Carnegie Hall, pals, but from the screen. The handsomest band leaders are on the screen today, more and more, together with the smoothest senders.

But to get news of just where the big band leaders are—those same lads who often sell a half-million copies of one record, for instance—to find out what they are doing where is not so easy.

Not so easy, up to now, that is. But here's where this department comes in. Every month, from now on, Movieland will report to you the best news, the flash news, the romantic news about the movie music makers.

The girl doing the reporting on all this is, we warn you, a hep cat terrific. She is also the hottest jitterbug at the Hollywood Canteen. (She got a prize for that.) She's sung with bands. To find out more about her, turn ahead to Page 74 this issue.

But right now, I'll let her talk for herself. R. W.

Hi, gang. Since I'm the chick who's elected to let you know what cooks on the Hollywood musical scene, I'll waste none of yours or my time, but go right into my tooting.

THE TUNEFILMS: The Twentieth Century-Fox lot was really jumping last month. Woody Herman and his crew were making rhythm for Sonja Henie's "Wintertime," and Benny Goodman's band was doing the same thing for "The Girls He Left Behind." Benny, who has always been reticent to do much singing, really gives out with the voice in this one. Of course Alice Faye and Carmen Miranda are in there pitching, too.

Charles Spivak and his orchestra started rehearsals for "Pin-Up Girl," the new Betty Grable film.

Vivian Blaine, the singing lead in "Jitterbugs," the Laurel and Hardy musical, is a newcomer to watch. She does three tunes in the picture, one of which you're sure to be hearing on the Hit Parade, "The Moon Kissed the Mississippi," by Lew Pollack and Charles Newman. In Vivian, the Fox big-wigs believe they have a new singing star.

Out Universal way they are all excited about Johnny Long in "Hit the Ice." Johnny and his band have been clicking nicely in the East for a long while, but his personality is really socko on the screen, and if he isn't careful, they will make him an actor for good.

Vaughn Monroe is another handsome baton-man who will try his luck in the flickers. He has been signed by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, and his first film will be "Meet the People."

The grapevine preview gossip has it that Dinah Shore will be a bigger star on the screen than she is on the air after the public has seen her in Warner Brothers' "Thank Your Lucky Stars."

In "Stage Door Canteen," Lanny Ross, the radio favorite, really comes through with a song called "We Mustn't Say Goodbye."

Paramount's "Riding High" has Cass Daley riding high with a super comedy tune, "Willie the Wolf." Cass is the girl who was so funny in "The Fleet's In."

You'll want to get a load of all these tunes.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC: With the record ban still on, there aren't too many new releases, but what we do have is good. First on the list is "Ellingtonia," a Brunswick album in the Collectors' Series. And it's the Duke at his very best. Most of the tunes are reissues of his early recordings, all instrumental, and they include such oldies as "Birmingham Breakdown" and "Black and Tan Fantasy."

David Rose's new album for Victor contains all the hit songs from big musical pictures from 1934 to 1941, and it is one of the finest albums ever pressed by any recording company. Bob Carroll and Pauline Byrne do the vocals. Pauline will be remembered as the "Miss" from the "Six Hits and a Miss."

Capitol Records have a platter that is as sharp as they come. Johnny Mercer swings "Waitin' For the Evenin' Mail" on one side, and Ella Mae Morse and Freddy Slack do "Get On Board Little Chillun" on the other. It's a solid sender.

EARMARKS OF HITS: The Vine Street boys really have their hands full with all the new songs in the air—and good ones, too. One of the prettiest ballads of the season is "May in Mexico" by Allie Wrubel.

"In My Arms" by Ted ("Praise the Lord," etc.) Loesser really got popular in a hurry. It sold ninety-six thousand copies in two weeks.

Meredith Willson, the radio conductor, who had great success with his first two songs, "Two in Love" and "You and I," has a new one which is destined to be greater than either of those. It is "Ke-Toky-I-O"—sort of a "K-K-K-Katy" of this war, and so cute.

Hoagy Carmichael's latest love song, "Dear Friends and Gentle Hearts," has a most interesting story behind it. The five-word title was written on a scrap of paper which was found in Stephen Foster's coat pocket when he died in a charity ward of New York's Bellevue Hospital many, many years ago. Carmichael was welcome to use the title because it was in Public Domain, meaning no copyright difficulties, you understand.

Lionel Newman and Charles Henderson wrote a swell rhythm ditty called "As If I Didn't Have Enough On My Mind." One day Lionel played it for Betty Grable, and she liked it so well she had him play it for Harry James. Harry liked it so well that he had an arrangement made for his band, took it to New York with him, and introduced it on the air. And it's got a good chance of becoming a hit.

Be on the listen for "You Could Hear a Pin Drop," a newy from Republic's "Tahiti Honey."

At the Hollywood Canteen the other night, Bobby Worth played and sang his latest, "A Fellow on a Furlough," and if applause means anything, he can look forward to its being another "Do I Worry."

JUNE-MOON TWOSOMES: They do say that Kay Kyser has gone overboard for Georgia Carroll, the beautiful blonde model turned vocalist on Kay's commercial radio show. And it looks like Georgia likes his attention—they are seen everywhere together . . . Lee Wiley and Jess Stacy are readying the shoes and rice routine. They have been romancing off and on for ages. Several years ago Lee was a big favorite on the air, and can still sing with the best of them. Jess, of course, is back with Benny Goodman, dishing out his famous brand of piano . . . David Rose has been gadding about with Margaret Whiting, Freddy Slack's vocalist . . . ditto Gloria de Haven, MGM contractee, and Gene de Paul, talented composer of "Mr. Five by Five" fame . . .

JAM NOTES: There is definitely no truth to the rumor that Pat Dane, Tommy Dorsey's bride of a few weeks, is going to sing with Tommy's band. She is still under contract to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, and although they have big plans for her, Pat's biggest plan for herself is to be just Mrs. Tommy Dorsey and accompany him on his tours.

There is a very strong possibility that by the time this is printed Dinah Shore will be on her way overseas to entertain the Armed Forces. As it is worked out now, she plans to visit every front where our boys are fighting. The servicemen really go for Dinah, having heard her often on "Mail Call" and "Command Performance" broadcasts.

News about Dinah Shore is that she's trying to get overseas. And maybe boys in uniform don't crave for her!

UTTER MADNESS

That Is What Hedy Lamarr and John Loder Call Their Marriage

"BOTH Hedy and I have been married before; I once, Hedy twice. We know the pitfalls, mistakes, and dangers of married life. Neither of us is looking for adventure. We have traveled extensively. Each of us is familiar with the gay life of peacetime Europe and the United States. We do not need any of that artificial excitement. More than anything else we both want real happiness and a home. We know life well enough to appreciate the real thing when it comes along."

It was John Loder speaking, and there was no mistaking his earnestness and sincerity.

"Both Hedy and I feel that, in spite of the fact that each has had our share of the good things of life, until now neither of us has ever felt wholly content. Always there was something lacking. Now that we are wed to one another, for the first time in our loves, we are completely happy.

"Never before has either Hedy or I found anyone who was entirely sufficient to the other. Bright night spots, gay companions, and dinner parties are no longer necessary for us to escape boredom. Nor do we need to keep open house so callers can brighten up long week ends and dull evenings. Since Hedy and I have had the best times when we are alone, we spend most of our free time just that way—with each other."

The fact that the tall, handsome Englishman John Loder and the Viennese-born Hedy Lamarr are opposites, as far as temperament, acts as a balancing wheel between them, as well as making their marriage both interesting and amusing.

When perplexing people or trying problems start Hedy expostulating and dramatizing, John's quiet amusement and witty remarks soon break her up. Immediately thereafter she is ready to sit down and talk things over. Her sense of humor and the fact that she never takes herself seriously soon saves the situation.

"Hedy's volatile nature, her energy and vitality, are just the right stimulus to keep me from settling into a too complacent, contented existence," says John. "Her fiery spirit and liveliness give me the mental prodding that I need."

Hedy and John had so much fun on their first date New Year's Eve that both are still trying to figure out how they possibly could have missed discovering each other's real personalities on the two previous occasions when they met. The setting was the Hollywood Canteen. John was carving a turkey for the boys, Hedy was serving coffee, together with autographs. They looked up, these glamour two, taking the measure of one another's unselfishness for being out "doing their bit" that night rather than merely amusing themselves. Only when their stint at the Canteen was done did they go out to see the New Year in at a night club.

"The time passed so swiftly and our minds clicked so perfectly as we dined and danced that I didn't want it to end," said John. "And I, who had sworn I had had enough of marriage, found myself saying to Hedy, 'Now if ever we got married, which of course is utter madness . . .' and Hedy laughingly interrupted, 'Well, I must say you are not very flattering.'

"As time went on 'utter madness' became our favorite expression. Only last night, when I sat contentedly smoking my pipe in my chair by the radio, Hedy came over to me and whispered, 'Utter madness, eh?'

"Lady Luck was with us with the New Year for neither of us was working. Day after day we saw each other, until we found it had become a habit that we wanted to continue forever.

"It seems incredible, but our desires are so much the same that each of us often anticipates an unspoken wish of the other. Take, for instance, the other morning when I wanted to go horseback riding. Hedy appeared in riding togs before I had time to mention it. It has become so usual for one or the other of us to get up and turn on the radio station that the other has been on the point of doing, that it is an old story.

"Once while driving to Big Bear, Hedy suddenly said, 'What happened to that English friend of yours?' Now I have, at least, thirty English friends in Hollywood. But I didn't even bother to ask her whom she meant. I knew she was refering to Richard Frazier, whom I had mentioned casually about two weeks before. 'He's signed a contract with Universal,' I said. Later I thought how strange that we both knew to whom the other referred without mentioning names. I could go on recalling similar incident after incident.

"Music, books, walking, riding are the things we enjoy most. As we can have all of these at home, we seldom feel the urge to go out.

"While Hedy's house, where we are now living, is charming and comfortable, we plan to move as soon as I can afford it. In the first place, the distance to our respective studios is too far for gas rationing. And the house is too small for the children we expect to have. We are agreed on that. There will be at least two.

"Both of us want a Dutch style house. A large roomy, two-story dwelling with the first story faced with big gray stones and the second painted white. There must be several wide fireplaces, plenty of deep comfortable chairs, nice pieces of period furniture, and lots of brass and pewter and tile.

"We prefer to live in Beverly Hills, as it is conveniently located for all the studios. The grounds must be deep enough so the house can set well back from the street and still have a spacious garden in the rear. If we achieve this, it will be much like the country home my parents still own in England. It will be a place that always brings memories of happy living. It will be a home for children, as well as adults.

"My wife is one of the few stars who sincerely wants to retire and have children. If my career continues to go along as promisingly as it is now doing, she will leave the screen when her present contract is terminated. As that will be in a little over a year, it won't be too long to wait.

" 'We will have fun when I am no longer a motion picture actress,' she says. She is truly embarrassed when people stare at her and follow her about.

"When we take dinner out, as we usually do when we go to a movie, it's amusing to watch people when they recognize Hedy. They become so intrigued that they forget to talk. Often they stop eating. The stillness is appalling. It is then that we start speaking in French or Austrian."

John Loder learned to speak German and French during the first World War. The youngest officer at the front—he was only seventeen—he had seen active service three years before he was wounded and taken prisoner by the Germans. After the war, his work in the Intelligence Service, which took him to France and Austria, as well as throughout Germany, made it imperative that he speak these languages fluently. Hedy, who grew up in Vienna, Berlin, and Paris, naturally spoke several languages.

"Travel will be the one temptation that will lure us away from home for any length of time," said John. "That is something we are both looking forward to doing a lot of. Our first trip, which will be a second honeymoon, and which we hope to take soon, will be to Mexico City. We also plan to go to New York as soon as possible. After the war it will be England, South America, China—the world.

"Both of us like to travel simply and lightly. While clothes are not especially important to either of us, each thinks that the other has excellent taste and wears clothes well.

"At home Hedy usually wears peasant dresses or a skirt and sweater. I like slacks and soft shirts and tweed jackets. When we go out, we like to dress according to the occasion.

"I have never known any woman who could dress as quickly as my wife. She never uses makeup at home, except lipstick, which she puts on in a second. All she does to her hair is run a comb through it.

"The mornings I drive her to the studio, which I do when I am between pictures, she is ready before I am. I tell her it's because she does not have to shave.

"I'll never get over the joy of having a wife who doesn't always want to rush out to some gay spot at night or forever have a lot of people around the house," he continued as he slipped his wedding ring back on his finger.

"Another great comfort is that both of us agree upon no visiting each other's sets. We think it is very disturbing, not only for ourselves, but also for the people with whom we are working.

"We never tire talking about how near we came to meeting each other in Paris, Vienna, and London. For years, we just missed one another by the smallest margin.

"For instance, in 1935, I was in Vienna on location for a British picture. Time hung heavy on my hands. The only people I knew, I now discover, were friend's of Hedy's. Hedy lived only two blocks from my apartment, yet somehow we never encountered one another.

"Again in Paris, I lived around the corner from Hedy's hotel. The night I went to the theater where she was playing, a last minute invitation to a party stopped my going back stage to meet her.

"If only we had met then, we wouldn't have lost all these years nor would we have made the mistakes of other marriages. But possibly it is a good thing we didn't meet. At that time neither of us had the tolerance and understanding that we now have. In the long run, our life together will work out much better for having waited.

"The fact that Hedy is so beautiful made it easy for me to fall in love with her. That would be easy for any man. But I have one advantage. I have learned that no matter how beautiful the woman you marry is, in a few weeks you find she is either a very nice person to live with, or she is not. Hedy is as beautiful spiritually as she is physically, which is a rare and wonderful thing indeed.

"Right from the start Hedy and I were together so much that it wasn't long before we knew each other's faults, as well as virtues. It is only after people relax and stop being on their best behavior that they really get to know each other. When we were married, we knew we liked being together—that we liked each other. You have got to like a person, as well as love, if you expect a marriage to be happy.

"It was during our week's honeymoon in a friend's mountain cabin at Big Bear, where we went directly after we were married, that Hedy and I found out how well we hit it off together. During the week we didn't see a soul or speak to a person, but each other.

"We did all the work. While Hedy made the beds and dusted, I swept and carried in armfuls of pine logs for the fireplace. We cooked and washed the dishes together. While Hedy tidied up the kitchen, I carried out the garbage.

"During the day we took long walks through the woods, rode horseback, or went fishing. In the evening, we sat in front of the blazing fire and listened to the radio or took turns reading aloud to one another.

"The more we saw of each other, the more we wanted to be together. Both of us feel we could have been happy living up there—or anywhere else on earth—alone the rest of our lives."

THE EXCLUSIVE STORY OF THE BETTY GRABLE-HARRY JAMES MARRIAGE

BY DOROTHY MANNERS

SCOOP! But really! We literally held the presses for this on-the-spot, exclusive coverage of the Grable-James marriage. Here it is, direct from Las Vegas to Movieland.

LET it be said to their credit that Betty Grable and Harry James tried to keep their wedding ceremony dignified, private only to themselves and their necessary witnesses.

The union was solemnized at four o'clock in the morning of July fifth in Betty's suite at the Last Frontier Hotel at Las Vegas, Nevada.

The reason for the unorthodox time and the honky tonk setting for that blissful scene . . . well, shooting schedules beset movie stars even in their most romantic moments.

Two days previously, Mrs. Louise James had secured a Mexican divorce. On the morning of the sixth of July Betty was due back on the sound stage at Twentieth Century-Fox and on that same Tuesday Harry had to rehearse for his radio show, "Broadway," for three days and then report to MGM on Friday.

So only by meeting mid-way, Harry rushing via streamliner from New York and Betty rattling up on a milk train from Los Angeles, could they meet in Las Vegas, be married, and have a one-day honeymoon together.

Harry and Betty even had the naive idea that they might be able to slip into Las Vegas, be married, and not have any one the wiser for a week or two.

They were wrong. For two days preceding the wedding, Twentieth Century-Fox had Betty's own press agent on the job up at Vegas, trying to protect their box-office queen from the crowds they knew would most certainly otherwise rush her. Strict orders were given out that no photographers were to be present, and absolutely no reporters.

A small church, called The Little Church of the West, was hired for the service. The county clerk stood by, waiting. The Reverend Dr. C. H. Sloan waited to read the vows. The sun boiled in the sky and the temperature hung at 118 in the shadowless roads . . . and all the while more people kept on arriving. Photographers came. Reporters came. The press agents and the hotel management tried to shoo them off. They wouldn't shoo.

Down in the hotel kitchens, Doc,

Harry gives out with a kiss—and what a kiss!—and Betty cuts the cake after their wedding ceremony.

the personality chef, toiled over a personality wedding cake. In the dance hall, Emil Coleman's band practiced "I'm Just Wild About Harry" and the James signature. In the little church, with its small pews, the flowers began to wither and the old frontier hanging lamps which lighted it flickered in the hot desert wind.

The trouble was that Betty's train, supposed to take eight hours to make the trip, was four hours late, and Harry's super-duper train was an hour behind schedule.

Betty finally arrived at about eight in the evening, took one look at the throng gathered to see her, and got the jitters. But she insisted upon going down to meet Harry's train alone when it finally came in—around three in the morning. She was wearing a close-fitting dress of ice blue crepe and her golden hair, hatless, hung in a long bob around her face. Dark circles of fatigue showed under her excited eyes.

Harry had no hat, either, when he and Betty finally arrived at the hotel. His hair was tumbled and his suit was creased. It was a dark blue suit with a pin stripe.

By the time they got back to the hotel, the crowd was even larger. The forbidden photographers had taken their stance along the second-story porch of the hotel. The forbidden reporters were popping out of parked cars.

Betty gasped. "Not the church," she whispered. "Not the church! Let's go to my room."

Betty had brought with her from Los Angeles Mrs. Edith Wasserman, the wife of Lou Wasserman, Harry's agent. Staying at the hotel . . . and ironically enough, getting a divorce, was Betty Furness, the ex-starlet. The two ladies, together with Manny Sacks, who runs Columbia Records, the firm for which Harry does his discing, were the witnesses.

The Betty the public sees in contrast to the Grable Hollywood knows—one the cute kid with the many-faceted figure, the other the sensible, sensitive girl who says she's now in love for the first time. Betty's next picture is "Sweet Rosie O'Grady."

The young man with a horn himself—Harry James, King of Jive.

While the flowers continued to die and the lamps to flicker in the small church, the lines were quickly read in that crowded hotel suite, the answers quickly given.

Harry and Betty had identical wedding bands, narrow and plain in yellow gold. "Because we want it to be an old-fashioned marriage," Betty said. Betty has never had an engagement ring from Harry because, while they have known each other for several years, they fell in love so swiftly . . . and because almost to the moment of their marriage they were uncertain as to whether or not Harry could get free to marry this girl who loves him so completely.

You can't be with Betty two seconds without realizing that she's head over heels, plain out of this world about him. Betty, that rare exception among stars, a girl who does not talk much about herself, bubbles over on the subject of Harry. It is the same thing with James about Betty.

And yet, the amazing thing is that Betty, for the first time in her life, admits that this love is the real thing. There are no question marks and uncertainties as there were about Jackie Coogan or even with George Raft. Ask Betty how she knows this is the real thing, and she replies with that level-headed common sense that is as much a part of her make-up as her Petty Girl appearance:

"Because I am completely myself when I am with him. I am not attempting to be what someone has advised me to be or expects me to be or hopes that I am. I am natural and relaxed in a way I've never been before. I am just Grable, the kid herself. That is because we speak the same language."

If Fate itself had played Casting Director, where, I ask you, could it have found more perfect co-stars for a real life love story than Betty, the dancing darling of the screen, and James, the Pied Piper of the Jive World?

They are cut off the same pattern, off the same material of modern life. If you are the bright Quiz Kid you should be, you probably know Betty's story by heart. She fought every step of the way, first ignored by Hollywood and then zooming to the top as the Box Office Queen of 1942. There have been many rough spots along the way for her, but she has surmounted them all. There is not much about Hollywood or about the shams of life anywhere else that will ever fool her again. When she isn't tapping her beautiful feet on the screen, they are planted firmly on the ground.

James' story—or the early part—is less known, except by his almost fanatical followers. He was born in the entertainment world—to be exact in a little town in Georgia about twenty-seven years ago, while his parents were traveling with a circus troupe. His mother was a bareback rider, his father a band leader. At four years of age Harry was a contortionist with the troupe. At six he joined the band as a "drummer." At eight his father taught him to play the trumpet . . . and it has been his life ever since.

With Betty and Harry it took their paths a long time to cross, but in many ways they have come along the same road. Their worlds are the same—the world of night life and of hard knocks and of Hit Parade tunes. Both of them, by the sheer dint of delivering to the public wants in entertainment, have soared to the top of their fields.

The surprising thing is not so much that they have found each other and are in love but that they did not fall in love at first sight seven or eight years ago when they met. If they had recognized then what they have found now, it would have saved them both heartaches. For Betty has known heartaches. Harry has known them, too.

I happen to know that they did meet those years ago in Chicago before either of them had clicked in a big way. In fact, both were at a low ebb in their lives. Betty's marriage to Jackie Coogan had gone on the rocks, and at that time Hollywood looked upon her as just another blonde cutie with Gorgeous Gams, which come a dime a dozen in movieland. Betty had gone out on a personal appearance tour—almost always a sign things aren't going too hot in Hollywood—and in Chicago she met James.

Jack Pyle, Photographer

One of those times when the King won a jitterbug contest with "comer" Nan Wynn.

He, too, was far from the top of the ladder that was these days to find his secretaries sending out twenty-thousand fan photographs a week, that was to bring out seventy-five hundred jitterbug addicts at eight a. m. before the doors of New York's Paramount Theater the day he opened there, that was to find him drawing down five thousand dollars per week on the radio and netting a cool half million in 1942 as the Dream Prince of the Rug Cutters.

In fact, when Betty and Harry were first introduced, he was in somebody else's band, just an exceptionally good trumpet player who was beginning to get the idea that the swing addicts could be weaned to something less hectic in music. (How right he was is proved by the sale of his records—over a million copies each of the sentimental "You Made Me Love You," "I Don't Want To Walk Without You, Baby," and "I Had the Craziest Dream.") But the serious, reserved, tall young man wasn't making a dent with his ideas then.

Betty, still in her teens, was one of his "public." She still is. That is what makes them so perfect together. On her recent trip to New York to see him, sought after by dozens of important men, by night club proprietors, by Broadway producers, she spent her entire vacation on the Astor Roof, watching and listening to Harry like his widest eyed fan.

Let it be said here that Betty honestly doesn't realize her own importance. She's humble enough to regard herself as "luck." She doesn't see why people run after her or why there are such great demands on her time. She is, therefore, as impressed with James' being in love with her as a small town girl might be. She hasn't yet considered that Harry is undoubtedly more impressed with her being in love with him.

Even back in those dark days in Chicago, Harry could set Betty's educated toes to tapping and start her to humming under her breath. She thought Harry was wonderful the way more mature fans were thinking Clark Gable was wonderful. Harry regarded Betty as a cute kid and a nice youngster, but that's as far as it went.

Several years later he met and married Mary Louise Tobin, a pretty little singer with Benny Goodman's band. Meanwhile, Betty clicked on Broadway and had come back to Hollywood, which had awakened to the fact that she was much more than a cute blonde. In three short years she zoomed to the top . . . and then there was George Raft in her life.

Much has been written about the Raft-Grable romance and parting. It doesn't need review here. Betty was grateful to George for his thoughtfulness and his consideration. She wanted to be in love with him. At one time she certainly would have married him if he had been free. Despite her dizzy appearance, Betty is no flirt. She is as different from Lana Turner's uncertain temperament, for instance, as love is from hate. During the three years Betty went with George Raft, she never looked at another man romantically—that is, not until the day when Harry James strolled casually back into her life, when he was imported with his band to fit into the new Grable picture, "Springtime in the Rockies."

By this time, jive was burning up the theaters and ballrooms of the country. Exhibitors were crying for hot name bands on the marquees. And young American jive hounds were wildly going James mad.

During the making of "Springtime in the Rockies," the James marriage was beginning to hit the rocks. Harry and his singer wife separated, reconciled, separated again. The hopeless tangle of George Raft's marital status was beginning to get Betty down. They were quarreling, making up, quarreling again.

Betty and Harry found themselves reminiscing like a couple of old friends. They talked records and music and careers. They made those wonderful discoveries about personal tastes in common that people always discover when they are falling in love. But I do not honestly believe they then knew they were falling in love.

When the picture was over, they went their separate paths. But this time they didn't, or couldn't, forget one another.

But for the first time it was noted that Betty was having dancing dates with men other than Raft . . . and always, it seemed, at the Palladium. One night, for the fun of it, and also for the cash customer value, the management announced a jitterbug contest to be run off between swing band maestros, themselves, and their partners . . . and who should win it but Betty and Harry James?

That was the first linking of their names together . . . but far from the last. When Betty finally broke with Raft, there were few Hollywood "insiders" who did not believe it was because she knew that she had fallen in love with Harry James. But once again Betty's good sense kept her from going overboard. Harry left for a New York engagement. Then one morning Louise James talked to Los Angeles newspaper men and said that she was planning to file a divorce suit against Harry soon.

The first thing Harry did when he got that news was to put in a long distance call to Betty in Hollywood.

The first thing Betty did was to catch a train to the big town to see him. The weather was hotter than the proverbial hinges all the time she was there, but every night the most famous James fan of them all sat quietly at a little Astor Roof table, one as close to the bandstand as any table could be placed, and waited till Harry finished his work.

During the day, while he had to sleep, eat, rehearse, catch up on the thousands of details of his band which is now "big business," Betty sat in a hot hotel room playing his records over and over, singing with them and to them.

Make no mistake about it—Betty is deeply in love and now the whole world knows with whom.

She says, "I have never been in love like this before. I have thought I knew what love was . . . but it hasn't been like this. When I met and married Jackie, we were both kids, too young to know our own minds or hearts. I never want to say anything that will hurt George Raft. I will always be deeply fond of him. But now I want to be married forever, to have my own home and children, at least two of them. If that means giving up my career, why okay. Maybe the way you know love is real is when you realize that nothing in life is important to you except preserving that love and making it more perfect and everlasting."

Thus on the morning of July Fifth in Las Vegas, Betty and Harry pledged their love. There being no escape, they posed for the waiting photographers, signed the autograph books, hastily sipped the champagne that had been iced.

Outside, the car was waiting to take them back to Beverly Hills, via another slow train, back to the house that Harry has rented for Betty.

Betty has turned her Bel-Air estate over to her mother. When the war is over, the James will see about building, will see what they can do to arrange their individual careers so that they will not have to be separated. They know now that they must part soon, when Harry goes into the army in October. That is one reason why, right now, they are jealous of every moment. They have so few of them in which to be together.

The dawn was just breaking as their car disappeared down the lonely desert road.

It looked like the beginning of a beautiful day.

It looked like the dawn of a wonderful life for Harry and Betty.

"TERRIFIC"

That's what the critics said about John Ridgeley in his role as "Irish" in Warners' "Air Force." For years John has been around Hollywood, trying to sell the studio biggies on giving him a change, and now . . . one smash hit, he's terrific! Want to bet you'll be seeing him again soon?

It was just as rushed and wacky as thousands of other weddings all over this country, where a boy's on furlough and a girl's in love

The Wartime Wedding of ANN SOTHERN and BOB STERLING

"DO YOU, William, take Harriette to be your lawfully wedded wife?"

"Do you, Harriette, take William to be your lawfully wedded husband?"

When the "I do's" were pronounced to these questions by two beautifully modulated voices, they culminated a romance that had kept Hollywood speculating for the last two years.

The setting was the picturesque Community Church in Ventura, California, some seventy miles outside of Hollywood.

Today, Harriette Lake, known to you as Ann Sothern, and William Hart, otherwise known as Robert Sterling, are the happiest couple the film city has seen in many a honeymoon.

The events preceding the scene enacted a warm Sunday when Southern California blandly lived up to the Chamber of Commerce reports, were as hectic as any romance dreamed up for the pair by the cleverest scenario writers.

The couple first met two years ago when the studio wardrobe girl casually introduced Ann to her new leading man. The picture was "Ringside Maisie," but neither Ann nor Bob knew at the time that Cupid was planning a knockout. Bob was comparatively new to the business. Ann, a star in her own right, found genuine pleasure in giving him the benefits of her wealth of screen experience.

On the set it was only a casual friendship. There was no indication that it would ever be more until one now-memorable night. Ann was on her way to visit Hedy Lamarr. Bob, whose home was adjacent to Hedy's, was out for an evening stroll. The two met. It was then Bob mustered courage to ask Ann for their first date. It was the first time they had ever seen one another outside the studio. They went dancing, and they had a wonderful time.

The news cameras clicked, and from then on, columnists, quick to scent a romance, were on the trail. The flush on Ann's cheeks and the sparkle in her eyes told more than she ever did in words. Ann is no girl given to quick emotions. Maybe she knew all along that she'd be Bob's some day. But she plans things sincerely and with dignity, does this girl who isn't like Maisie at all in private life. Ann and Bob went out with no other dancing partners from that first date on. More than a year went by and then came 1943, which has proved a year that is no respecter of plans, romantic or otherwise. Eventually the same thing happened to them that has happened to couples all over the world. One morning Bob announced that he had enlisted, and Ann, like all the other girls in America, never questioned a Fate that made such things necessary. She knew Bob was right and was proud that he wanted to serve.

It was no movie parting that took place the day Bob was to report for duty. There were no tears, no hysterics. Ann and he said goodbye as any two sensible young people would.

Bob was stationed at Santa Ana for his pre-flight training. For eight weeks his and Ann's only communication was via telephone. A few precious moments that meant to Bob a good hour's wait in a long line of other khaki-clothed cadets, as anxious as he to speak to their loved ones.

During those weeks, at home, Ann sat by a phone nightly, her mind in a muddle. She missed Bob desperately, but she wanted to be sure. After all, these were uncertain times. Her common sense told her, "Wait until this is over. Wait until you and Bob can be man and wife with a safe and sane world ahead." But her

Here come the bride and the groom, smiling on the world, smiling on their fans—but ah, the trouble they went through before they got there!

Look closely and you will see the two wedding rings that made a fearful amount of difficulties.

It was a kiss like this, before the altar, that made Mrs. Ray Milland hiss, "Break it up."

Even an hour before the ceremony was due to start, fans waited, like this, around Ventura's pretty little Community Church.

Alone, at last, in their car after the service.

heart said, "Perhaps we shouldn't. Perhaps we should take what we have now. No one really knows about tomorrow."

Bob finished his pre-flight training, only to be stationed farther away from Ann, at Thunderbird Field in Arizona. He wasn't yet entitled to furlough. Ann was busy with "Swing Shift Maisie" and "Cry Havoc," so they still had to depend on letters and sadly brief phone calls, and no one seemed to be winning the mind vs. heart argument. No one ever really does. But, as Ann says, "Something outside always happens to swing the decision one way or the other." Something did in this case. It was a bad appendix.

"Hello, honey," Bob's voice said to Ann one night, and the moment she heard it over all that distance, she knew instantly that something was wrong. "Don't get excited, but I'm going to the hospital tomorrow. Just my luck, only fifteen more hours and I'd have finished primary. I've tried to hold off, but the doctor says 'no.' Now I'll have to begin all over again. Don't worry, honey, I'll call you as soon as I can."

Bob's voice was gone. He had said, "Don't worry." Ann tried—and failed miserably.

Exactly ten days later she met him at the station. Cadet William J. Hart had been granted two weeks sick leave (his first furlough in eight months).

The moment he stepped off the train, Ann knew the answer to her problems. Her heart had won. War or no war, Bob was right. There was no use to wait.

Now, they had both wanted ample time to prepare their wedding. It was to be quiet and simple, with no fuss or confusion. Just their families and a few close friends. But true to Hollywood, Ann had just started work in "Cry Havoc" and here was Bob with only two free weeks!

It was an unscheduled "day off" for Ann that started things rolling. The couple made tracks for Ventura to establish their license. Ann concealed her hair beneath a scarf. Bob, in his uniform, looked like any other personable flyer. They thought it was all a carefully guarded secret. Who tipped off Louella Parsons is still a mystery, but Ann and Bob's plans for a "nice, quiet little ceremony" went up in smoke with the first edition of Louella's column next morning.

By the time the twelve o'clock whistle blew on the set the next day, they realized that since the secret was out—why wait at all? Ann's portable dressing room was the scene of their conference. They agreed on the next afternoon for the big event. The place would have to be Ventura, where the license was obtained. Bob went to telephone, and five minutes later he was back, beaming with happiness.

"Everything's set," he said. "Tomorrow at two. Before I even mentioned names the minister inquired if it was for us. I wonder how he knew?"

From that point on, time went crazy for Bob and Ann. Bob raced out of the studio to purchase a wedding ring, tell his family the news, order flowers, notify his best man, get a hair cut, sandwich in four important business appointments, and comply with a studio request for pictures of the two.

Ann raced to her dressing room to have her hair done, make out a reception guest list, phone home for dinner arrangements, study her lines for the afternoon scenes, and order a wedding ring for Bob. This latter proved a larger order than even a movie star could cope with. War marriages have caused a shortage of plain gold bands. Frantic calls were placed to all nearby jewelers, and they came rushing to the studio suggesting silly substitutes. In the meantime Bob was having similar trouble. He, too, discovered wedding rings were at a premium.

At the height of the excitement there was a knock at Ann's dressing room. Margaret Sullavan, who had overheard the conversation, stuck a pert, Dutch-bobbed head through the open door.

"I have an offer to make . . . that is, if you aren't superstitious," she said. "I have a perfectly good ring in my jewel box at home. It's just the kind you're looking for. You're welcome to it if you can't find what you want before the stores close. It was the one William Wyler gave me. It didn't work for me, but it might work for you."

But Ann was superstitious.

Bob phoned. He had found her ring—a three-band design, diamond flanked by gold. A jeweler came to Ann's dressing room. He had just one ring, brand new, but it needed a bit of stretching. This couldn't be accomplished overnight. As a result a "stand-in" ring was procured.

It was six o'clock that evening before Ann even had time to think about the thing that most brides consider first. What should she wear? A new dress was out of the question. Time marched on—on the double.

A survey of her wardrobe resulted in the choice of a two-piece ensemble. Softly tailored, it was fashioned of navy blue crepe, and was Bob's favorite among her dresses. It also was definitely the "something old and something blue" all brides have to have. Ann selected a new pair of fuschia gloves to match the white and fuschia orchid corsage Bob brought her, and borrowed a white lace handkerchief to tuck in her bag. That completed the "something borrowed and something new."

At high noon the next day, May 23, the wedding party assembled at Ann's home. Plans were to leave at twelve-thirty. It was one o'clock when the cars finally pulled away.

Three blocks from the house Ann made a startling discovery. The stand-in ring had been securely slipped over her gloved finger when she left. Now it was gone. A quick search revealed it was only hiding behind the seat of the car. Mrs. Ray Milland, who is Ann's closest woman friend and who was to be matron of honor, became custodian of the ring for the remainder of the three hour trip.

"Guess I'm not very dependable," Ann remarked. "Darling," she turned to Bob, "after two o'clock today I'm never going to make another decision. I'm going to be strictly a clinging vine and let you do the thinking for both of us for the rest of my life!"

The car rolled on down the highway. Twenty odd miles clicked away. The sun shone. The birds sang. The fragrance of orchards in bloom sweetened the air. Bob had suddenly become unusually silent. Finally he spoke.

"Dear," he said, in a very small voice, "do you have the license?"

Ann didn't. The car pulled to a sudden stop before a country drug store. Bob bounded out and placed a call to a friend in Los Angeles and waited frantically while the friend, on another wire, called Ann's home. Ann's maid said she would wait for him on the curb, license in hand, and then he was to make tracks down the Coast Highway. One of the cars in the party would turn back to meet him and then rush on again to the church.

It was on the way out of the drug store Bob spied a rack of greeting cards. One caught his attention. It was inscribed, "For Your Golden Wedding."

Today this card is among Ann's most treasured possessions. On it, in Bob's handwriting, are the following words:

"And I forgot the license . . . but I love you."

The envelope was addressed to Mrs. Robert Sterling.

It was two-thirty when the wedding party finally arrived at the Ventura Community Church. The entire population of the town had arrived hours before. Ann and Bob tried to make a dash through the crowd, but the door to Reverend Theodore Henderson's study was, unfortunately, locked. It seemed like hours before the bridal party managed admittance.

The excitement of the crowd was equalled only by that of Bob and Ann. As Reverend Henderson began the ceremony, Ann began to cry. When the time came for the couple to exchange rings, Bob extended his right hand instead of his left, which completely mixed them up for a minute. The kiss that sealed the ceremony exceeded any screen attempt on the part of either. It was Mel Milland's quiet whisper, "Break it up!" that brought the lovers back to reality. That and the fact that a breathless messenger was now racing down the aisle waving an envelope with the license.

Ventura children crowded the church balcony. They had remained since Sunday school. But Ann and Bob were too happy to disappoint them. Not only did Ann and Bob brave the crowd in the church, but they left by the front door so that they could exchange greetings with the throng of well-wishers outside.

Finally, safe inside their car, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Sterling headed back for Los Angeles.

The "quiet, peaceful ceremony" of their dreams was over, but their dreams of a beautiful life together were just beginning.

The wedding was followed by a reception at the Beverly Hills home of the Ray Millands. It wasn't one of the guests that met them at the door, but Milland's four-year-old son, Danny.

"Hi, son," Bob said as he lifted the baby up in his arms. "I hope that some day we'll have a dozen like you."

If Mrs. Sterling has anything to say about it . . . they will. It has long been her belief that there's no substitute in the world for a happy marriage and a child. Fame, money, and adulation cannot take the place of a home with children.

"When any woman attempts to make a movie career take the place of children," Ann says, "she is asking for heartache."

Their first meeting, and the first scene they ever played together was this— Bob and Ann in "Ringside Maisie."

above—Movieland runs this picture just because we think it is one of the most charming stills ever taken, and completely captures the mood of innocent childhood. If you must have facts, the little girl is Anne Carter. When we asked Anne what she did in the movie she said, "I get strafed"—which is just what does happen to her.

above—Jane Withers plays her first serious role in her eleven-year-old movie career, as a peasant girl who becomes a guerrillo fighter in defense of her country. Janie and Farley Grainger, off screen, are most aware of each other.

right—Fine actor, Dana Andrews, plays a Russian flyer. Dana seems to be moving into that spot Spencer Tracy was occupying for so long, of being the guy who never gets the girl—on screen. He gets nothing but tragedy in "The North Star."

AFTER a flood of Norwegian-background films, Hollywood has now discovered Russia as a spot for drama. Warners', as is their habit, beat out the other studios with their "Mission to Moscow," but MGM has "Russia" itself in the work, and Samuel Goldwyn has "The North Star" nearly completed. The scenes herewith are from this latter film.

"The North Star" concerns forty-eight hours in the life of a Russian village, the day before and the day after Germany's invasion. The young lovers of the film are Anne Baxter, who took over the role Teresa Wright sacrificed for motherhood, and Farley Grainger, a California kid of seventeen, making his movie debut. Their change of moods, reflected here, shows the keynote of the movie, the contrast between laughter and the sadness of separation, when war comes.

All this and Cretonne Too!

BY MICHAEL SHERIDAN

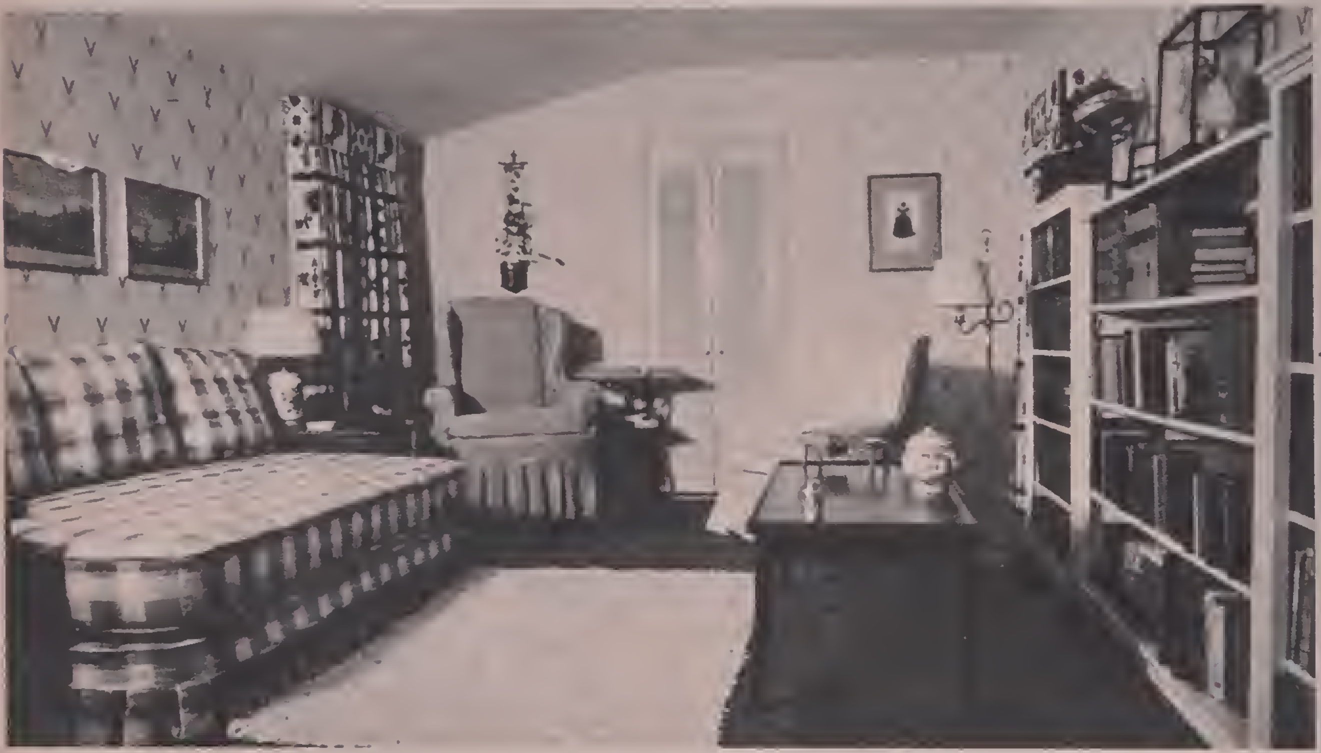
VERY often that harassed look on the face of your favorite film star is not what you think it is. It does not come of a bad script, a temperamental director, servant problems, or a fruitless love affair. Nine times out of ten it is because he or she is doing over a house.

Stars who live by day in the glitter and grandeur of studio sets often find that their homes suffer greatly by comparison. The very essential qualities that should make their home livable, charming, and unusual, often appear strangely absent. Furthermore it is nothing that money, average good taste, or a few half-hearted suggestions from friends can put right.

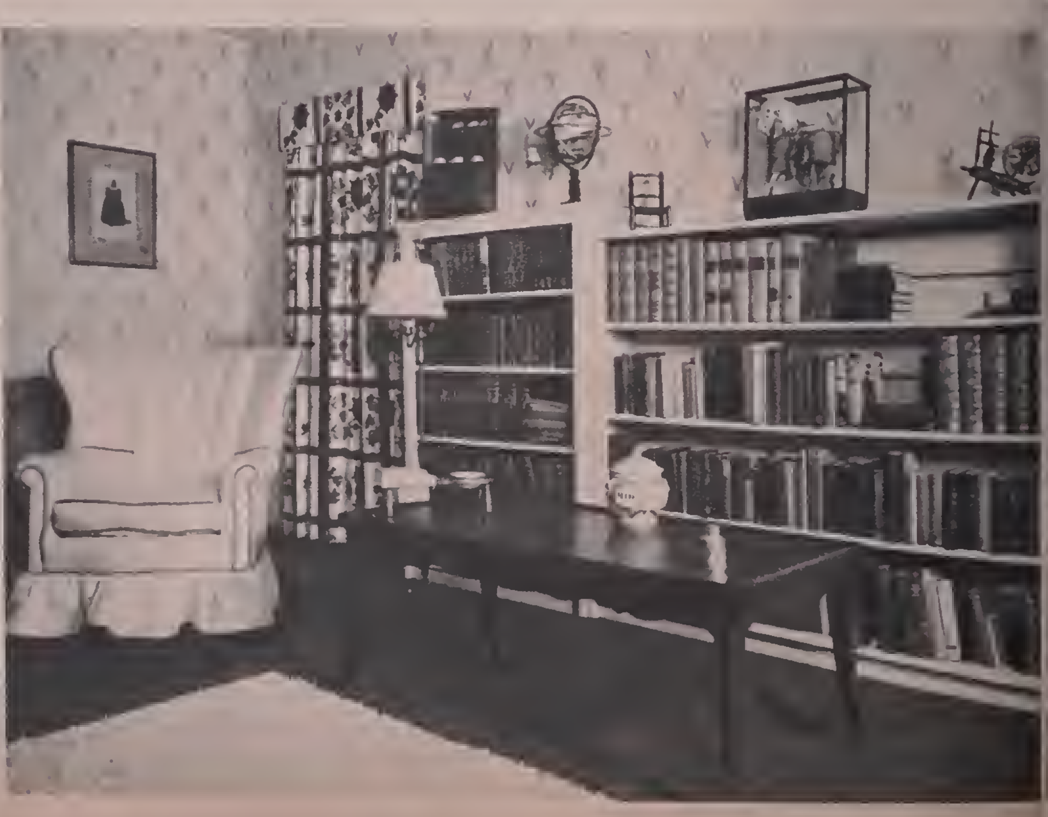
The short periods between pictures is hardly time enough to remedy the wrongs of a graceless, discomforting, and sometimes slipshod abode. After all home was not built in a day, and that is where the interior decorator comes in.

It wasn't always thus. In the earliest movie days, it was sheer horror. That was the era of houses which looked like Moorish temples, the Palace of Versailles, and home very much on the range. Often these frights were side by side on the same street. Their furnishings rarely, if ever, had anything to do with the architectural style of the dwelling, but ran pretty exclusively to Spanish shawls draped over grand pianos which were seldom played and to mechanical doves that kissed over the front doors of honeymoon cottages.

Those days are gone forever,



Red, white, and blue were the gay colors chosen by the author of this article for Myrna Loy's den. The draperies are of hand-blocked chintz in blue and white, the wing chair has a practical slipcover in battleship gray with red piping, and the throw rug is of looped string made in Puerto Rico. The comfortable-looking couch in red, white, and blue plaid is merely a mattress and springs on legs and serves the useful purpose of an extra bed. Photograph by Taplitt.



Another view of Myrna Loy's den shows her great love of unusual antiques. Among the accessories, without which no room is ever complete, there is a miniature French Provincial dresser, a Colonial spinning wheel, and a rare Celestial globe. An Arab steed in all its primeval splendor stands in the center of the simple bookcase. The old mustard jar from France, on the coffee table, holds cigarettes. Photograph by Taplitt.

William Haines and Joan Crawford.

Douglas Fairbanks Jr., when a husband to the lovely Miss Crawford, became very much devoted to a large red leather chair. It was a comfortable, masculine chair, but it did not fit well into any of the very artistic rooms that Bill Haines designed as a beautiful setting for Joan. Therefore Bill would continually try to get Doug to give up that red chair, and Doug would consistently refuse. The chair moved from living room to playroom, from playroom to Doug's bedroom, but it was always highly visible wherever it lodged, very red, terribly oversize.

When the news broke about the Crawford-Fairbanks divorce, Haines gave a sigh of relief. "Now I can get rid of that blasted leather chair," he exclaimed.

All in all, interior decorating for the stars provides a great deal of excitement. It has all the elements that come from reading a good detective story—everything hangs in the air until that last moment when the ends are pulled together, and everything fits into a neat and satisfactory pattern. The suspense is there, too, because you never know when the body will pop up.

Sometimes it is a very alive body in the form of a relative who knows better what your client should have or what you think she should have. That he or she stays alive is attributed only to the placidity and patience of the decorator. But in the end you win, and the body that lies in the closet is bad taste. Very, very dead. If you can't do that, then you're no decorator.

At the end of five years of decorating, my favorite client remains Myrna Loy. For one thing she knows what she wants, and her preferences always stay well within the small confines of good taste. She had a trick which both amused and depressed me.

My assistant would arrive with a bunch of say a hundred materials, well-folded and strung together. Myrna would pick out one material from the whole batch by flicking the edges and running through them like a pack of cards. She was never wrong. It was always the perfect choice with the texture just right for the particular piece of furniture for which it was intended, while the color would blend with everything in the room.

Myrna Loy, now married to John Hertz, Jr., and dividing her time between New York and Miami, has always lived in enchanting houses, and it is because of her remarkable sense of color, her taste for good pictures, and her flair for picking just the right accessories that they all came off as beautifully as they did.

That Myrna knows what she wants, and how to go about getting it, is evidenced by her New York apartment which transcends any of her former domiciles. It is smaller than anything she has ever had, but it is lovelier, much more livable, and is the final graceful accomplishment of a woman who has had many homes and finally found the one she's going to hold on to.

If Greer Garson had not been an actress she might very easily have been an interior decorator. She is very adept with a pencil, and what she can't put into words appears like magic on the back of something.

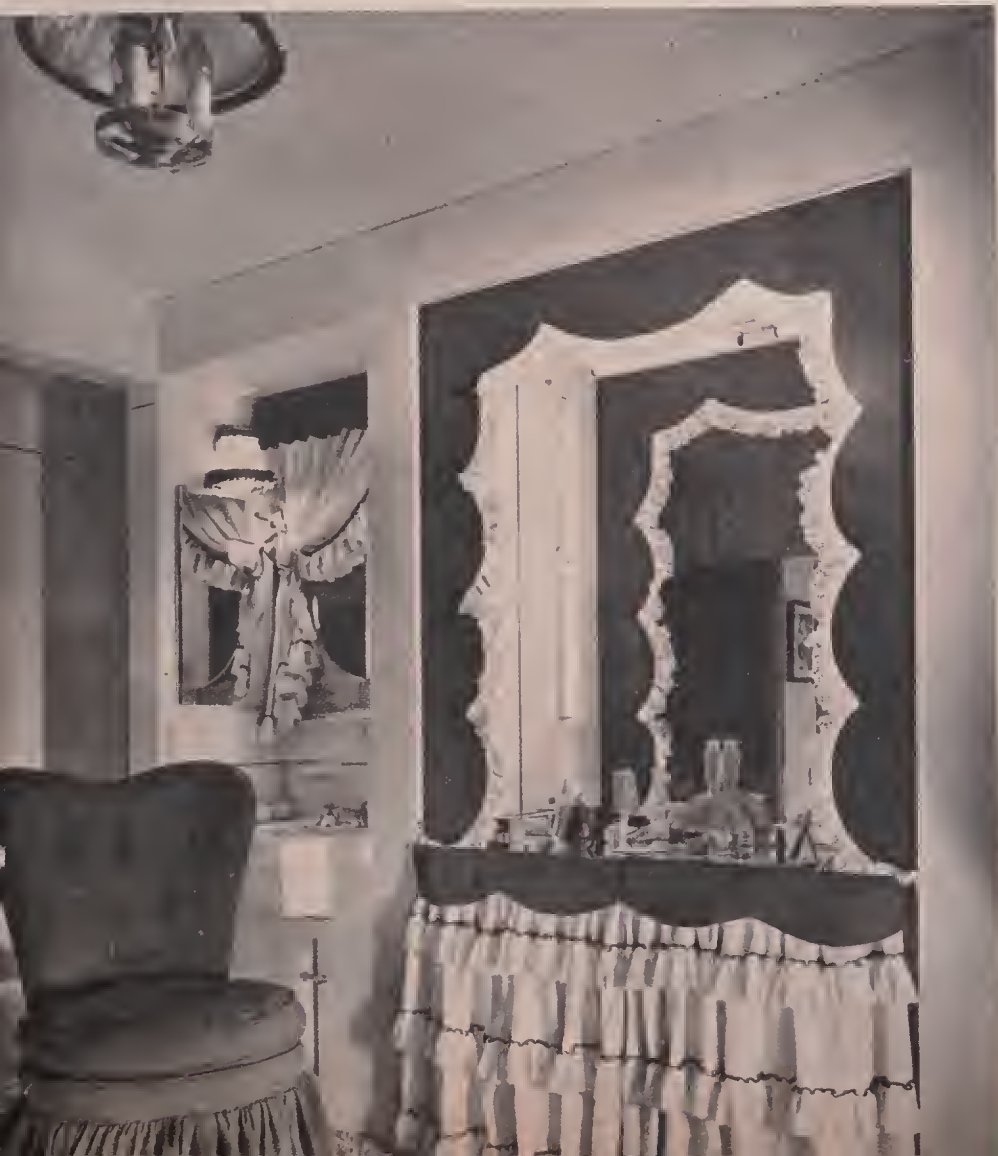
It was on a magazine cover that she drew a very professional-looking sketch of the dressing table she wanted me to make for her. It was very simple, and unusually effective. An oblong sheet of heavy glass supported by two white fluted pillars in which she would keep her cosmetics and perfumes. There was to be a lock to the little doors with silk tassels instead of knobs.

I shall never forget the day I delivered these exquisite white fluted pillars. Because she was in a hurry to get them, I had brought them in my own car. I had just finished unloading them, and had rung the bell, when the door was opened by Miss Garson's Welsh maid. Without a word she turned and raising her voice loudly said, "Miss Garson, a man with garbage cans is here!" Our poor white fluted pillars!

Working with Rosalind Russell is another pleasant experience. She is perhaps the most efficient star of them all, financially, artistically, and technically. Either she likes something from the very beginning, or she doesn't like it at all. No amount of talking will make her change her mind.

With her mind set on one thing, whether it is an old antique desk, or a set of wine glasses, or half a yard of hand-woven fabric to cover a small lamp shade, nothing on earth will deter her from getting her own way. Furthermore, she knows exactly how it should be made, when it ought to be ready, and just how much it is going to cost.

I don't think Rosalind Russell has forgiven me yet for letting her put a striped wallpaper in her bedroom. Apparently at night the stripes would come to life like the gay, serpentine streamers of a Mardi-Gras; as if that weren't



Barbara Barondess MacLean, former movie actress, and now a Hollywood decorator, did this dressing-table affair for Jane Wyman. enough, they were never still, always fluttering and twisting themselves into knots, as some striped wallpapers sometimes do. To this day I can still hear Rosalind Russell's reproachful voice, "What have you done to me, Michael Sheridan?"

IN THE delicate matter of home decorating, Hollywood has become more color conscious than ever. Whereas before many a star would think that a few carefully chosen antiques, some new lamp-shades, and perhaps some different draperies would brighten up the house, now it is a case of spending the money on the walls, the ceilings, fabrics, and dyeing the rugs and draperies. This demands a firm and extensive knowledge of colors, the parts they play, and the havoc that can be wrought in choosing them carelessly. At the moment there is a great preference for pastel shades, and the more delicate and gay they are the better. Walls instead of being painted are now merely tinted, and the paint shops who put out a paint to go over wallpaper are doing a landslide business.

Hollywood, more than any other city in the country, has always used color extravagantly. The climate has a lot to do with that. Client after client has said to me, "I want you to bring the garden into this room," or "I would like the sun to always shine in this room," or "it's my beach house, and I want to feel the sea and the sand and the moon in here."

In New York I never found anyone who wanted to give an effect of clouds, rain, or terrific heat to the interior of their home, nor did I find in London an occasional dowager likely to scream, "For the Empire's sake, bring in the fog!"

So in Hollywood we have color and more color. Those who don't care for pastel shades go in for deep, dramatic tones. The lavish greens of the Williamsburg restoration, or the dazzling reds of Empire memories, and the striking whites of the Syrie Maugham epoch of English decorating; they all have a play in the movieland scheme of decorating. Barbara Stanwyck Taylor's living room is a riot of red and green, dramatically and magnificently combined.

Talking of color, I shall always remember Ethel Water's black and silver living room in Harlem, Carole Landis' persimmon and white living room, Ian Hunter's red, white, and blue beach house. Gaiety in color in most of my decorating has been a predominant requirement, and I have acquiesced gracefully and sometimes feverishly. But often I am quite sure that the great painters of the past would not have approved.

There have been many amusing experiences in the course of doing so many houses. And some very sad ones. There was, for example, the woman star who called me up in the middle of the night with a strange request. She was about to have a nervous breakdown. Her doctor had advised one of two things: three weeks at the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital, or a complete change. Would I please come over right away!

When I arrived, she told me that instead of going away she had decided to re-do her house. First of all she wanted everything thrown out. She wanted to start from scratch. What did I think? Frankly, and as much as I wanted to do a house for this charming person, I couldn't see how it could be improved upon. It was as nearly perfect as any house a good decorator can produce with plenty of money and able to work without interference.

It didn't take me long to find out that the lady's new arrangement was going to be the same, only in reverse. That is, without money and plenty of interference. And yet I went on with it. I went on getting the job done. I acceded to all of her requests. I had to; it was a question of her health or mine.

By the time I was finished, I was a much sicker person than she was, and wouldn't you be with a ping-pong table in the living-room, a motion picture projector in the master bedroom, and a Victorian card table where her husband could play poker? Wouldn't you?

But it was not always like that. There was the fun and excitement of doing William Wyler's house with cherished French Provincial antiques, with the added reward of always a prompt check and a nice smile from the lovely Margaret Tallichet, his wife. There was the brilliant and always beaming concert pianist Artur Rubinstein who, one day in moving some furniture with his beautiful wife, fell suddenly on his cherished hands. They were crumpled up beneath him on the stone floor. However, the amazing Mr. Rubinstein merely got up and with his usual good-natured smile said softly to his wife, "Dear, don't you think we should call somebody from the storage?"

Marlene Dietrich hurrying in for an unusual gift for Jean Gabin; Andrea Leeds as excited as a child over some old Georgian silver; Franchot Tone lost in rapture at a painting by Vlaminck; Alfred Hitchcock shivering ecstatically at sight of the same painting; Barbara Stanwyck and her love of old china; these were all moments that made the rest worthwhile.

In the course of decorating, almost any member of this much criticized profession is subjected, at one time or another, to some queer requests. A mere love of pets sometimes leads to extravagant demands upon the decorator.

Recently one of the more masculine of the movie stars wanted a comfortable darkroom in which to develop his efforts at amateur photography. He was carried away by such enthusiasm that it ended by having enough in that darkroom to furnish a small house. There were large sprawling couches, antique tables, valuable paintings, embossed rugs, handsome draperies, everything but a space in which to develop pictures!

Philip Dorn, when I did his house, insisted on a radio in practically every room. Also a specially-built cabinet had to be made for each radio. The strange part about this request is that Philip Dorn, being one of our actors most in demand, works at the studio all day, spends his evenings reading and studying manuscripts, while what little time he has left for relaxation finds him puttering in the garden.

On the many occasions I have visited him after doing his house, I have never heard any of the many radios playing. Also I have a grave suspicion that, should anyone be so thoughtless as to turn one of them on, Mr. Dorn would be considerably ruffled.

Yet, all in all, I have found that most of the Hollywood stars profess a genuine and sincere desire to have comfortable, livable, and charming houses, not at all like the ones you see on the screen even now.

Thus the Hollywood homes today rank in beauty and good taste and dignity with many of the finer homes in the older parts of the country, and that is because synthetic glamour, cheap tricks, and sheer expensive impracticability no longer have a place in movieland's new pattern of life.

THE END

HAVE YOU HEARD THIS ONE?

Scene, Mexico City. Place, a night club, very late.

Dennis Morgan and Errol Flynn, two of movieland's happiest practical jokers, were in the below-the-border-city on a good-will jaunt for their studio. They met a charming and pretty Mexican girl from an excellent family. The girl didn't speak a word of English so they set out to teach her a few phrases.

Imagine the surprise of one pompous gentleman in the Warners' party when he came up to the table to be introduced to the charming girl, whom he had been eyeing all evening.

She smiled at him and in acknowledging the introduction said, "You look juss like Donald Duck."

P.S. He did.

Roz Russell discovered that she was just plain lazy.

His brother's anger liberated Charles Laughton.

Dorris Bowden found a super turning point in her life.

THE TURNING POINTS IN THEIR LIVES

Like yourself, the stars have moments when Fate steps in and alters all plans

By JESSIE HENDERSON

COMES a moment in life when Fate takes you by the scruff of the neck, gives a twirl, and whoosh! things are never the same again. You know? A turning point. Or Fate sliding a banana peel into your path. It may be a complete somersault.

This happens to film stars, too.

But to film stars it generally happens in a more spectacular way or with more spectacular results. In them (we may as well admit it) Fate has more spectacular material to work with. Take, for instance, Bing Crosby. His turning point was an axe.

When Bing went to Gonzaga University, which is in the state of Washington, the shadow of celluloid had never crossed his outlook. Indeed, far from yearning to be a singing film star, Bing didn't even want to be a singer. What he wanted, and he wanted it more than anything else in the world, was to play professional baseball. On the college team he had developed into a dandy short-stop.

During vacation, however, Bing took a job in a lumber camp. Full of enthusiasm for the beautiful Northwest woods, the free life and whatnot, he swung his axe gaily. And almost at once he cut both his legs at the knee.

The cuts were deep. Bing not only had to give up his job in the logging camp, but he had to give up his dream of professional baseball. He could never run fast enough to play short-stop again.

Things looked pretty indigo but, had he known, it was only the midnight blue before the golden dawn of Bing's real career. He sort of liked to sing, and he began bursting into song in a casual way with an amateur college orchestra. He sang and sang, though people told him he could never become an A-1 singer because of a defect in his vocal chords that made his voice wobble.

That's how Fate built Crosby a career out of a couple of accidents. If he hadn't practically cut his legs in two, he'd never have taken up singing; if there hadn't been a lump on his vocal chords, he'd never have become the world's most famous crooner and top flight movie star. Some difference, incidentally, from playing baseball!

IT was an insult that made Barbara Stanwyck a success. A nasty, catty remark that was meant to slap all the ambition out of her.

When Barbara was a chorus girl on the New York stage, she danced so well that the stage manager always gave her a good spot in the front line of girls. Another chorine, fiercely jealous of Barbara, happened to sit beside her in the dressing room when they were putting on their makeup one night. Barbara mentioned something about a difficult dance step, and how she'd practiced it until she thought she could do it in her sleep.

It was an axe that changed Bing Crosby's life.

The other girl stared at her, lids narrowed in contempt. "Stop kidding yourself," she sneered at Barbara, "you'll never make the big time! You're not the type." And she turned insolently back to the job of applying eye-shadow.

Instead of discouraging Barbara, the taunt aroused all her Irish stubbornness, of which she has a-plenty. In a flash, as things do sometimes happen, her amiable ambition to be a good dancer hardened into an unbreakable determination to be a success. If only for spite.

"Is that so?" Barbara blazed. "You wait a while, and I'll show you!"

As it turned out, there was only a little while to wait. Not long afterward, Barbara got a role in a stage play called "The Noose." The role was fairly important; more than that, it was Barbara's first good chance to show what ability she possessed, and she went for it like a terrier for a rat.

Day and night she worked on her lines with terrific concentration. She would go to the theater for rehearsal, and stay afterwards far into the night; practicing her dialogue in the dark auditorium when the only other sound would be the squeak of the night watchman's door, as he started out on his rounds. Now and then it would seem to her that she must drop on the floor from sheer weariness, but then the words would ring in her head, "You're not the type. You'll never make the big time,"—and, fightin' mad, she'd rehearse the scene once more.

In that role in "The Noose," Barbara made her first hit. And whenever during her career she's felt discouraged, she has thought of that girl in the dressing room, and her Irish streak has leaped up and at 'em as ardently as before. Barbara says she owes her success to an enemy whose name she's forgotten, a girl whose whiplash remark proved a bigger help than a pat on the back could ever have been.

AS for Charles Laughton, if his brother hadn't got mad at him, Charles wouldn't have been an actor at all. He'd have been a country hotel keeper in England.

Laughton's father owned three hotels and, in accordance with English law, Charles, as the older son, inherited all of them. This considerably burned up his brother, who liked the hotel business and knew that Charles didn't.

To tell the truth, Charles already had a leaning toward the theater. As a pudgy boy, he used to bribe the chambermaids in his dad's hotels to watch him perform "King Lear" in a sheet and pillowslip. He was so fascinated by the stage a few years later that once when serving a dreary term as clerk in a London hotel, he saw one Gilbert and Sullivan operetta fourteen times.

Aside from his love of drama, another thing made Charles impatient of the unexciting life led by a country hotel keeper. He had seen combat in the front line trenches during the first World War; after this, the assigning of rooms to guests and checking the market list were a deadly routine that made him bite his fingernails.

Arrived a fateful hour when, unable to bear the triple dullness of his three hostelries, Charles went for a long walk. Upon his return, he found things in a splendid mess. The cook had given notice at the first hotel, the laundry hadn't returned the linen at the second, the roof needed mending at the third . . .

And Laughton's younger brother was in a dither. He met Charles with a biting tirade, reproaching him for neglecting the hotels and for lacking interest in the management. Whereas he, the brother, doted on hotel keeping, knew precisely what ought to be done.

Charles listened a while, then flew into a rage. Slamming his fist on the table, he roared, "You can have the damned business! I'm going on the stage!" Then he snatched his hat, caught the next train for London, and that was that. Within two years Charles was among the most famous actors in England. P.S. The three hotels did all right, too. Neither Charles nor his brother ever regretted that lucky quarrel.

IT was a magazine, picked up in an idle moment, that jolted Rosalind Russell out of the lethargy that held her back from making a go of things. She's never been lethargic since.

Rosalind roamed New York at the height of the depression, hunting for a part in a stage play. Her daily route took her to an agency or two, and subsequently she would drop in at a Times Square drugstore where many of the theatrical out-of-works congregated. There she would drink a soda, and agree that the depression certainly was dreadful.

But on a certain morning, in the outer office of an agency, Roz chanced upon a magazine article with the caption, "Are You Really Trying?" Roz thought, "Am I?" It struck her like a lightning bolt, "Why, I'm just stalling." That day and the next she visited every agency, instead of giving up after one or two.

"The third afternoon, by glory," Rosalind says, "I landed a job!" It was with a summer company that performed in a tent through the countryside . . . but it was a beginning. Roz had learned the power of persistence, though, and a beginning was all she needed.

JOHN LODER has had an extraordinary life, with more than one turning point in it. In fact, there's been a complete about-face in his personal life, and another in his career.

As a very youthful British Captain—aged eighteen—Loder and some of his men were captured by the Germans in the first World War. The officer who took them prisoners, sentenced them to execution by a firing squad. Loder and his men were lined up against a wall, facing the German rifles, and resigned to death . . . when along came a German officer of higher rank than their captor.

It was a tense and terrible moment. But the new officer, seeing German wounded lying nearby, ordered the English prisoners to carry them to a field hospital. Afterward, Loder and his men were held in a German prison camp for nine months—they had escaped death by five minutes.

The war over, Loder remained in Germany and opened a pickle factory (of all unlikely things!) in Potsdam. The business folded. Loder had no money, but he did have a good dinner suit, so he applied for work as a dress extra in a picture Alexander Korda was making. Korda took him, and it was pickles to pictures in twenty-four hours. A fellow extra—and it happened to be her first picture, too—was a girl named Marlene Dietrich.

BUT it was Dorris Bowden who met up with the goldarndest turning point you ever heard. Dorris even remembers the date: September 14, 1938. She wasn't getting anywhere as a stock actress at 20th Century-Fox studio, so she decided to make the rounds of all the producers on the lot and beg for a small part in a film.

She waited three quarters of an hour to see Nunnally Johnson, to ask him for a role in "Jesse James," only to find that the feminine roles had already been assigned. Johnson gave her the old line about "keeping her in mind" and she went away thoroughly discouraged.

He did keep her in mind, all the same. Two days later, he invited her out to dinner. That day—September 14, 1938—proved the turning point in Dorris Bowden's private and professional life. In the afternoon, she won the lead in the Johnson-produced "Grapes of Wrath"—the forty-fourth actress tested for the part! And in the evening, she became engaged to Johnson. They were married at Nyack, New York, almost eighteen months to the day from the time Dorris first entered Nunnally's office. Their baby daughter was a year old last February . . . and mother is back on the screen again in "The Moon Is Down."

This is among the nicest turning points Fate has ever handed out.

The End

ROY ROGERS' Little Buckaroo

BY DORA ALBERT

ROY ROGERS chuckled. "No, I didn't pace the hospital corridors for hours before the baby was born. Want to know the truth? Art Rush, my agent, and I sat in the fathers' waiting room, playing gin rummy. I won seven dollars and twenty cents. We started playing gin rummy Saturday afternoon, went out for dinner, then resumed our game. No, we didn't sleep that night—just went on playing gin rummy most of the night and into the wee hours of the morning."

If you don't know Roy, that might sound like a gay, modern, almost indifferent father speaking. When you do know Roy and his wife, you realize how far from the truth this is, and how much both of them wanted the baby. The arrival of that baby was a dream come true.

The story properly begins one day, several years ago, when Roy was visiting an orphan asylum in the East. Because he's devoted to kids, Roy always responded promptly to any request to entertain children in a hospital or in an orphan asylum.

He enchanted this particular group of children with his playing of a guitar and with his singing of their favorite songs. Then the time came for him to leave. Most of the youngsters said goodbye politely. But one little girl threw her arms around him and began to sob her heart out.

"Please don't go," she begged. "Please don't leave me." The tears cascaded down her cheeks. For almost an hour Roy tried to stop her tears and to get enough courage to go. When he finally left, he couldn't tear out of his mind the picture of the little girl who had sobbed.

When back in Hollywood, he told his wife about it. She said, "I've noticed how children always seem to love you, honey. And I know how you feel about them." Her hand was in his, and his hand was gripping hers tight. She said, "We'll have kids of our own some day."

But somehow the children they both wanted so much didn't come. It's been printed that a doctor told Mrs. Rogers that she could never have any children.

"That's not true," she told me, smiling. We were talking together in the living room of the rambling

1. Roy and Cheryl have always been playmates. Republic's executives may think they're his bosses, but his real bosses are Cheryl (shown here) and Linda Lou.
2. "You're going to have a baby brother or sister," Roy and Mrs. Rogers told Cheryl, their adopted daughter. At first Cheryl insisted that she wanted only a baby brother, but when a sister came, well—read what happened then.
3. "Gee, it's a girl, and it's beautiful," Roy told Arlene, his wife. Roy was so sure it was going to be a girl that he bet another prospective father twenty dollars on its sex.

Rogers cottage in Encino, about ten days after the baby had been born. The doctor had told her that she could sit up for three hours that day. Sitting on the couch in her gay pink negligee, Mrs. Rogers was still a little weak, but her eyes were shining.

"No doctor ever told me I couldn't have babies," she went on in her soft voice. "But Roy and I got tired of waiting. We wanted one so much. So when one of our own didn't come within the first few years of our marriage, we decided to adopt that little girl who had clung so to Roy. We went back to that orphanage, but someone else had already adopted her.

"So Roy asked me to visit a children's home in Texas with him. He'd already been there before. A matron began taking us through the wards. Suddenly Roy and I, as though moved by the same impulse, stopped at one little crib. Inside was a little girl with blonde curly hair and the biggest, most appealing brown eyes. I don't know which of us spoke first. I think we both said simultaneously, 'That's the one.'

" 'Don't you at least want to see the rest of the babies?' the matron asked. 'No,' Roy and I said, 'that's the one.'

" 'But she's only six weeks old,' the matron objected. 'We couldn't let you adopt her till she is three months old.'

" 'Then we'll wait,' Roy said. 'We'll come back for her.' "

This is just what the Rogers did. They took a bassinet with them, but they never needed it. For Cheryl Darlene, as they decided to call her, went right into Mrs. Rogers' arms and stayed there. And also, she went right into the hearts of Roy and Arlene.

"We never had any trouble getting used to having a baby in the house," Arlene Rogers said. "We never had the feeling that this was an adopted baby, and that we had to get her accustomed to our ways. She seemed to fit right in from the beginning, just as though she'd been our own baby. And Roy and I started playing with her right away, just the way you'd play with any baby, bouncing her up and down when she was little and taking her for piggy-back rides when she got a little older.

"It was funny, the first word out of her mouth was 'daddy.' 'Mama' came next. Always, she was fascinated by Roy, and still is."

The voice that has thrilled millions on the screen thrilled Cheryl Darlene. She grew to know its cadences as she knew her own right hand. Roy sang to Cheryl from the time she was a little infant, lying on her tummy. As she grew a little older, "Ridin' Down the Canyon" and "Yellow Rose of Texas" became her favorites. When her bedtime came around, it was hard to persuade her to go to sleep unless Roy would stand by her bedside, singing "Yellow Rose of Texas." Even the night he had to depart for the President's ball, he could not leave the house to catch his train until he'd sung "Yellow Rose of Texas" for Cheryl.

Cheryl and Roy were playmates. Anyone could see that. She followed him everywhere. When he went down to the yard to have a look at his pigeons, she followed him, and made absurd efforts to feed them. Sometimes, in a more mischievous mood, she'd shoo the pigeons away from their nests. But when she was tempted to be naughty, one word of scolding from Roy or Mrs. Rogers usually made her behave.

Because Roy had sung "Ridin' Down the Canyon" for her, she had to try to sing it herself. She toddled over to the big piano, began to bang out what she hoped was a melody, and started to sing in her child's monotone the words of the song. Of course, she was completely out of tune, but Roy stood by the piano, beaming as though Cheryl were Lily Pons. At frequent intervals, when she stopped to catch her breath he'd say, "That's wonderful, Cheryl."

Sometimes Roy would take Cheryl to the studio with him. Her big brown blinkers would be larger than ever then, taking in all the sights. Best of all, she liked Trigger. Like her dad, she's crazy about horses. When Roy was between scenes, she'd beg and cajole him to let her ride Trigger. So he'd take Trigger out on the back lot, and there Cheryl would sit on Trigger's back, while Roy humbly and proudly led the horse around.

When Roy and Cheryl returned home, Roy would be the horse. It was quite a sight to see the big cowboy getting down on his hands and knees, so Cheryl could mount his back. Then Cheryl would pretend that Roy was Trigger. "Get up, Trigger," she'd say. Then, "Giddyap, Trigger," and finally "Whoa, Trigger."

Then came the wonderful day when Arlene told Roy that they were going to have a baby of their own. His face melted with happiness. Roy's sisters all have families, and he'd always dreamed of having a family, too. Cheryl was a glorious start, but just having one baby in a home didn't seem right. They'd planned to adopt at least one more child, but now all plans changed.

Arlene asked Roy whether he wanted a son. "It doesn't matter," he said softly. "Gee, I feel great thinking about it." Then he laughed. "We'll be happy, no matter which it is."

Mrs. Rogers thought it only right to tell Cheryl the news, too. She wasn't afraid that Cheryl would be jealous of the new arrival, since the little three-year-old is just as crazy about babies as Roy himself. When her mother told her that there was a baby brother or sister on the way, Cheryl said, beaming, "I wanna baby brother."

Roy said jokingly, as so many fathers have, "Oh, sure, if it's a girl, we'll just send her back." The day the baby was born, Roy phoned Arlene's mother to let her know it was a girl. Grandma told Cheryl, who rushed to the phone and cried, "Oh, Daddy, please don't send the baby back!"

The week before the baby came, Roy was supposed to go on location for his new Republic picture, "Silver Spurs."

"But that's impossible," Roy said. "Have a heart, fellows. I can't leave before the baby's born."

Now movie companies are supposed to be soul-less corporations which can't afford to delay a production just because their stars are going to become fathers. But immediately, production on "Silver Spurs" was delayed.

On Saturday morning, April 17, at eight o'clock, Mrs. Rogers was taken to the hospital. Roy was allowed to be with her only till ten that morning. Then the nurses told him he'd have to wait in the fathers' room. That was when the gin rummy game began, while between hands, Roy uttered silent prayers that the baby and Arlene would be all right.

When Roy finally did see the baby behind its plate-glass window, she was as red as could be and wrinkled as all new babies are. But when Roy was admitted to his wife's room, he said, "Honey, it's a girl, and it's beautiful." Arlene smiled. She, too, thought the baby beautiful, with its dark blue eyes and dark brown hair. She thinks that it looks just like Roy.

Arlene's mother took Roy aside. "I think Arlene likes the name 'Sandra Sue,'" whispered Mrs. Wilkins.

"That's quite a tongue twister, isn't it?" laughed Roy. Then he said, "How do you like the name 'Linda Lou?'"

The name is a combination of the names of two people Roy likes very much. Lou Crosby is an announcer on the Lum and Abner radio program. Linda was Roy's leading lady in four of his pictures.

"Let's ask Arlene whether she likes it," Arlene's mother said. So they did, and she did. The name seemed to fit the mite of humanity who slept so peacefully.

Friends and fans of Roy sent all sorts of gifts for the new arrival. One unusual gift was the song which Nat Vincent wrote and dedicated to Linda Lou.

"So far I've just sung Nat's song in the house," Roy told me. "If some day the opportunity should come up, I guess I'll sing it over the radio."

The day after Linda Lou was born, Roy bought a beautiful diamond ruby ring for Arlene. "I wanted to give her something for what she gave me," he says.

They let me look at Linda Lou. She was sleeping on her tummy, as usual. "I want to see my baby doll sister, too," said Cheryl, when she saw me being admitted into the sacred presence. Cheryl has a room full of dolls. She regards Linda Lou as a sort of super doll, much more fascinating than Nanny or even Gabby, the big doll given her by Gabby Hayes.

Cheryl is too young to know that she's an adopted baby, but they're getting her accustomed to the word "adopt." Each time she gets a new plaything, Roy tells her, "We're going to adopt a doll for you" or "How would you like to adopt a kitten, Cheryl?" Thus the word "adopt" is tied up in her mind with things she's loved. When she's old enough for Roy to tell her that she, too, is adopted, the word won't chill her heart. He'll tell her then that he picked her out of a world full of babies.

Cheryl has learned to love Linda Lou with all her baby heart. Ask her, "What did you get for Easter?" and she says, beaming, "Linda Lou."

The day Arlene was ready to leave the hospital, Roy had just time enough to bring his wife and the baby home; then he had to go on location. "Silver Spurs" had been delayed just as long as it was possible.

While he was away, Roy was calling constantly to find out how the baby was. "Now that I'm back home," he told me triumphantly, "I get a chance to watch her eat, and I try to get her to laugh. The nurse won't let me help feed her, and Arlene insists upon being in full charge of the diaper department."

Mrs. Rogers smiled. "Well, I won't sing any lullabies to the baby," she said. "Roy is the singer in the family. He can do the serenading."

So some day if you pass a cream colored Spanish style house in Encino, surrounded by palm and pepper trees and with petunias growing near the doorstep, don't be too surprised if you hear a familiar voice singing a lullaby. It'll be Roy Rogers singing to Linda Lou.

WHY YOUNG SOLDIERS LIKE TO BE STATIONED IN CALIFORNIA

Things like this happen: Susan Peters plays hostess to soldiers . . . and the soldiers return the compliment and host her around.

Susan Peters, since her role in "Random Harvest," is considered the most promising young starlet in Hollywood. Recently she invited three soldiers to be her guests at her studio, and conducted them on a tour of the MGM lot.

The boys, working on the theory of "one good turn deserves another," asked Susan to visit them near Beverly Hills where they are stationed. There she learned about their world—one full of fantastic looking machinery and a lingo all its own.

Red Skelton, in costume for "Du Barry Was a Lady," posed with them and Buster Keaton.

On the set of "The Youngest Profession," Virginia Weidler and Jean Porter reversed the autograph procedure.

They took her first to their dugout and introduced her to additional members of their outfit — the mascots.

Having a robust appetite, Susan couldn't wait for dinner (beg pardon . . . mess) to be served. She sampled first.

Susan met the boys at the gate and steered them toward a sound stage to watch a picture in the making. Happy grins?

Second thrill came when they spied Lionel Barrymore on the lot and Susan introduced them to "Dr. Gillespie" in person.

Moseying through a farmyard set, they found an ancient wheel-barrow, and of course Susan had to be given a ride.

Susan was escorted into their camp by her trio of soldiers, plus two more who had put in their bid for a bit of glamour gazing.

From what she had seen at camp, Miss Peters figured the boys worked hard enough. So she played waitress.

The day ended with a group photograph taken as the sun was setting. Susan told them, "I bet I had more fun than you did."

Movieland Selects Five "Best" Pictures This Month

BATAAN

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

"BATAAN" is a very worthy tribute to the courage of the Americans and Filipinos who held the Philippines from the Japs for ninety-six precious days. For film purposes, the story here centers around one particular patrol of men, (during the evacuation of Bataan) which is assigned to blow up an important bridge in the jungle in order to retard the Japs' progress and to hold the surrounding ground.

Sergeant Bill Dane is their leader, and the men themselves are straggling remnants from different outfits, even including a sailor. It is perhaps the most realistic war picture yet made. The uniforms are tattered, the faces are dirty and hardly distinguishable behind the beards. There are no pseudo heroics. The men act as men would in such a grim situation, realizing it is hopeless, but staying on to do what they can.

"Bataan" necessarily is not a cheerful picture, though it has its moments of laughter. It has no "plot," no love story. It cannot be classed as escapist entertainment and will certainly not take your mind off the war. It again brings up the argument about war films and whether they should be shown as entertainment. For ourselves, we think the very truth of it, the terrible, vivid drama, the honest portrayals of very typical American boys, facing inevitable death, raises "Bataan" to heights greater than mere entertainment.

Robert Taylor as Sergeant Dane has never been as fine as he is here. Lloyd Nolan is superb as a cynical private. Newcomer Robert Walker as the gum-chewing young sailor is true stellar material. Also in the picture, and not to be minimized for their performances, are Lee Bowman, an Army captain, and George Murphy, an Air Force lieutenant.

DIXIE

BING CROSBY in new tunes and old hits.

Do you have to have more than that for your money? We wouldn't.

But for pure luxury in entertainment, we list some additional items for you:

1. Dorothy Lamour, Marjorie Reynolds, Lynne Overman, Billy de Wolf (new and so amusing), Eddie Foy Jr., and scores of others.
2. There are the most gay, colorful settings, and clothes by the very talented Raoul Pene de Bois.
3. There is Eddie Sutherland's shrewd direction.
4. There is nostagalia heavy as perfume all over the film—that nostagalia that most of us feel these days for anything as peaceful as the old South with its charm, graceful manners, and romantic gaiety.
5. And it's technicolor throughout of course.

Specifically, this is the story of Dan Emmett, the dreaming Southerner who quit his job as a feed store clerk, picked up his five hundred dollar inheritance so he could start a minstrel show, because all he wanted to do was act and sing, and the minstrel show was all he could put on with practically no funds and a lot of happy-go-lucky players.

It is also the story of his two loves, the girl whose sultry beauty nearly destroyed him (that's Dottie) and the girl who won his pity and protection (that's Marjorie).

Compounded of songs, laughter, and pathos, the picture moves lazily and enchantingly. Throughout it all Bing sings, Bing clowns, and even dances. He's never been the star more completely in possession of his own type of vehicle as he is in "Dixie."

Perfect for the whole family, this one.

MR. BIG

GATES, this is it, the jivinest, singinest hoop-la we've seen in months. It stars young Donald O'Connor, and if you haven't yet caught him, go get a load.

"Mr. Big" is young as a puppy and satisfying as a double-dip malt and concerns itself strictly with a bunch of kids and a bunch of bands and a hatful of songs and dances, all of which are keen.

The Davis School of the Theater teaches drama and serious arts to teen-agers. But around the corner from the school Ray Eberle and his band are pounding it out. Donald, ringleader of the school, persuades the gang to go and gives Ray a listen. The bunch all totter over, even including Penelope, a nice little girl whose Aunt Mary gives the Davis school huge donations. Auntie is a super-highbrow, and the mere idea of jive makes her shudder.

Auntie, going out of town, orders the school principal to have the kids whip up a Greek drama for their graduation play. Donald stirs the kids up to the thought of putting on a musical comedy instead. Auntie comes back the night of the show and all - you - know - what breaks loose.

You may not think that plot's so original, and you're so right. It isn't original, but Donald O'Connor, very ably assisted by Gloria Jean, Peggy Ryan, Robert Paige, and Elyse Knox, makes it all seem fresh as a new morning.

The O'Connor is really terrific. He's got the Rooney technique, without either Mickey's heartpull or some of his annoying mannerisms. We aren't prophesying that he'll crowd the Mick off the bench, but he may knuckle in alongside.

You'll really have a swell time at this—and you might just as well see a new star in the borning, too.

BOMBARDIER

(RKO Radio)

THIS has for the spectator all the thrills of learning bombardier training . . . and none of the discipline or discomforts.

Starting before Pearl Harbor, Major Chick Davis tries to persuade the conservative Army heads of the value of precision bombing. His best friend is a pilot who opposes the idea of bombardiers ranking above pilots in actual combat, and their mental feud, as well as the conversion of the Army heads to Chick's point of view, gives the background for the story.

Against it, a group of recruits are changed from happy-go-lucky boys to intelligent, eager bombardiers, willing to sacrifice their lives in preference to ever giving up the secret of our most guarded bombsight. One of them is tempted by an enemy agent. Another gets very much involved with love. Another is amusingly pursued . . . and caught . . . by an amorous girl. One finds it almost impossible to conquer his fear of heights. But the lot of them emerge, each triumphant in his individual way.

All of this adds up to an exciting, frequently romantic, and always informative production. And that, to us, sounds like one of the best balanced pictures of modern times.

Pat O'Brien is a pleasant blend of toughness and humor as the Major. Randolph Scott is his usual persuasive self as the pilot. There are two new guys who are very much worth watching. (Incidentally, we warned you about them several issues ago.) Anyway, they are Walter Reed who is most handsome and Richard Martin who strolls off, amusingly, with every scene he's in, as a Mexican named Rafferty. Anne Shirley flits about as the girl they all most admire.

You really should put this down on your must list.

ACTION IN THE NORTH ATLANTIC

HUMPHREY BOGART'S first picture since "Casablanca" is no romantic companion piece.

"Action in the North Atlantic" is the grim re-enactment of the life of our Merchant Marine heroes these days, those quite unsung heroes who dodge U-boats and Nazi planes to get the cargoes through to our allies. Its scenes are so truthfully portrayed that except for its fine actors, it seems more like a documentary film than a regular feature movie.

It concerns itself with a crew of very average seamen torpedoed in the Caribbean who promptly signs on again to join a convoy sailing for Murmansk. Their captain is Steve Jarvis (Raymond Massey), their chief mate Joe Rossi (Humphrey Bogart). The chief mate is as cynical as the captain is religious.

Their ship, the "Seawitch," runs into fog almost at once, gets into a battle, has to leave the convoy, dodges a sub by night and fights by day, finally escapes by a clever ruse that the chief mate works out.

Most of the action is spine-tingling in its intensity. The torpedoing scenes stand out as some of the best we have ever seen. But it must almost be confessed that there are episodes . . . particularly the thin romantic ones . . . that drag. They seem to be thrown in to fill certain requirements of a good all round movie rather than because they have a direct bearing on the plot.

The infusion of United Nations propaganda when the "Seawitch" joins the convoy, when men of the Allied Nations meet and sit together to plan out their common destiny, is impressive beyond description.

Newcomer Dane Clark stands out particularly, and Massey and Bogart give their expected strong performances. Julie Bishop, in for a very few scenes, suffices.

Movieland's BEAUTY PARLOR

COME on in!

Through Movieland's Beauty Parlor henceforth, we are going to bring to you beauty facts and foibles from the palace of beauty—Hollywood. No place in the world knows as much about beauty than does that of the motion picture capital.

It isn't hard to understand why, either, since beauty is a commodity sold in the theaters of the world.

Do you know what would happen if you saw your own face in close-up on the screen? It would be magnified two hundred times! Every little freckle, blemish, and fault would step right up and smack you in the eye; and you'd probably be the most discouraged little wren in captivity! It's this very fact that has made Hollywood make-up artists tops, because they can see at a glance what needs to be done to glorify Jane Doe.

There's no reason why you shouldn't benefit from all this knowledge. Consider these pages, then, the booths of a beauty parlor—a beauty parlor that brings to you for free all of the past, present, and future beauty rules of Hollywood.

Every month, you can walk with us down the corridors, meet Hollywood stars, observe their beauty problems, and learn their solutions. Take a good look, and listen well.

Elyse Knox illustrates the first step in setting a pincurl. Elyse has selected a small section of hair and dampened it. Placing the middle finger of her right hand under this strand of hair, she grasps the ends with the left hand and brings the strand around the tip of right middle finger very tightly. She continues winding this strand around the tip of the finger, lap upon lap, until the very end is reached. Notice that Elyse protects her frock with a transparent beauty apron.

One of the first things you'll notice about Hollywood beauty is the wonderful quality of shining cleanliness and neatness, both in hair and make-up. Cleanliness of face, body, hair, is dinned into feminine ears here morning, noon, and night. So, for Pete's sake, if it's that important to Hollywood, why should you be the lone, rugged individualist who neglects to remove the day's make-up before hitting the trundle bed; who disdains the use of face cloth, soap, and warm water; and thinks of a brush only as something with bristles? Make this your credo: You can't have beauty without cleanliness!

The second quality is neatness—neatness of make-up and hair. Make-up for the street shouldn't be applied as if you were making a finger-painting. A finger-painting sometimes shows budding genius, but a face with cosmetics applied on the same, daubing principles clearly points the way in the opposite direction. Has your man ever said, "I see you've got your war paint on?" If he has, mend your ways, and quickly. He wasn't flattering you, not by a long shot. It's his way of saying your make-up is obvious and without talent. Make-up should appear natural.

Now, as to neatness of hair: Along with countless others, we've been having a good many thoughts on the subject of woman's crowning glory, especially in relation to feminine wage earners. Keeping hair neat when you have a heck of a time squeezing in a beauty parlor appointment once a week or so is a major problem. You know it; so do we, and so do Hollywood's actresses. Don't for a minute think they spend part of every day under the tender ministrations of an operator. They don't. Time is important to them, too. But never do you see a glamour girl with a hair out of place!

Thinking along these lines, our mental processes led straight to pincurls, and pincurls in turn led to two questions: Why don't more women make use of this quick method of hair grooming? Why do Hollywood stars take advantage of this at-home beautifier while the average girl does not?

We were surprised to find that the majority of girls either don't know how to set them or think they are difficult!

Pincurls are easy, dry quickly, and give results—pre-supposing, of course, that you have a permanent or naturally curly hair. Best of all, there is no danger of hair breakage, no matter how often you do the trick. (Your old friend, the curling iron, does plenty of damage in splitting ends each time you take advantage of its supposed help. Give it to the scrap drive, and you'll have rid yourself of a prime hair saboteur!)

Because it's a work-a-day world for us women today, whether we're in war industries, office work, or in branches of the services, we are all rushed for time. It's this same rushing that's the enemy of hair neatness and the cause of up-springing, unruly locks. Usually, these little locks develop along the front hairline, and nothing gives you such an all-over straggly feeling and appearance.

If your present headgear is a war factory turban, under which your little gray cells are busily planning an after-work date, hurrah, take before-work time to put in a blueprint of pincurls. Now, wrap on your turban, and settle down to your riveting, letting the pincurls dry on the job. Comb them out at shift's end, and you'll look fresh out of the beauty parlor.

If you're one of the lucky mortals with a loose bob and heavy hair, you can set three or four pincurls where they'll do the most good. Over them, comb a camouflage of dry hair, and settle back to let nature take its course.

Or, if you're an office worker with plans for an evening's romanticism, but with no time off for beauty, take the first five minutes of your lunch hour, set your curls, clap on your hat, and let them dry during the luncheon routine.

One of Hollywood's most consistent addicts of the home pincurl is Universal's Elyse Knox. Not only is she not hard to look at, but Elyse keeps her hair in that shining state of neatness we mentioned somewhere along the way. With her help, we've given you the way to do it. Just read the directions under each picture.

Exercise of the Month:

Hollywood girls are firm believers in exercise. After all, there is nothing under the sun that keeps a gal on the qui vivre like a circulatory system that's perking one hundred per cent. So each month, our beauty parlor will give you one outstanding exercise that's good for you. Lesson No. 1 comes from Julie Bishop, who is featured in Warner Brothers' "Action in the North Atlantic." La Bishop's daily beauty routine begins with lessons learned from her cat. Watch your own household feline, and you'll soon understand why stretching is one of the finer forms of exercise.

Why not start off, like Julie, by planting your feet wide, raising your arms straight above your head, and grasping one hand with the other? Now, place your feet together and start revolving from the waist; first right, then left. Swing while stretching—high, wide, and handsome—forward, to the sides, and back.

If you're a beginner, start off with five minutes, gradually increasing the time to fifteen.

After this exercise, train yourself like a Spartan to alternate hot and cold showers with a needle-fine spray. We guarantee, as does Julie, that it'll send the blood racing through your veins. Besides lifting the spirits, it acts as a cleansing agent for the skin. And you don't know what you've missed if you haven't experienced the after-shower rubdown with a heavy bath towel that has been dipped in sea salt (a pharmaceutical preparation) and has been dripped dry.

If your circulation doesn't break all speed records at this point; if you don't feel as if you have a new lease on life, then it's time to consult your doctor!

UP, UP, UP!

Surely, you've noticed that hair is going up — unobtrusively, quietly, simply—a la natural, or with the use of switches, crepe hair, and other contrivances that will bemuse and confuse the poor male.

Actually, it's a story that begins at least three years ago, because it was that far back that Hollywood's hair stylists and feminine brigade began going in for the up-do in a big way. The rest of the country's women have been a little slow in following suit—again, we have a hunch, because they thought such hairdresses couldn't be achieved without outside help. And again, we're here to tell you it isn't so. You can use crepe hair and switches along with the best of 'em.

To digress for a moment, we're going to retrace our steps to the subject of cleanliness.

Southern California, blessed in so many other ways, is also favored with little dust in the air, and no soot. You probably think at this point that we're way off the beam. If so, stop and take a good look at your own noggin and a quick one at those of your friends. Maybe you live in a clean climate, but maybe also the glance we suggest will reveal dusty hair. "Dusty" is what we said and is what we mean. Dust and soot do collect on the hair, obscuring any natural tendency to shine, making it look dull and lifeless.

Right here is where that little instrument of health, the brush, comes in. Brush, brush, brush, from the scalp outward, morning and night. A comb will not combat dustiness. See, too, that you use a clean brush. It's smart to have more than one on hand and to alternate. It's a great way of combating the dead-hair look between shampoos.

If you're introducing yourself to an up-do via the use of crepe hair, it's doubly important that this aid to nature is kept clean. Don't leave it lying on your dressing table to collect face powder and fine particles of dust. Keep it in a drawer when not in use. Cleanse it at least once a week in a good, dry cleaning fluid, spreading it apart with the fingers as you remove it so that it can regain its resilence. Place it in the sun to dry. Remember, too, that because crepe hair (which is nothing more or less than wool crepe) nestles close to the scalp it absorbs more than its share of oil. If that doesn't move you to keep it in spick-and-span condition, then we give up!

If you're using a switch, let it be cleansed at least as often as your own hair is shampooed (best to let your hairdresser handle the switch); in the meantime, don't forget to brush it as often as you do your own hair.

Having digressed for something more than a moment, we'll tell you of one of the loveliest up-do's we've seen recently. It's worn by Greer Garson for her role in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "Madame Curie." A word to the wise, however, should be sufficient: Before you copy it, be sure yours is a face that takes a center part and can stand trying simplicity.

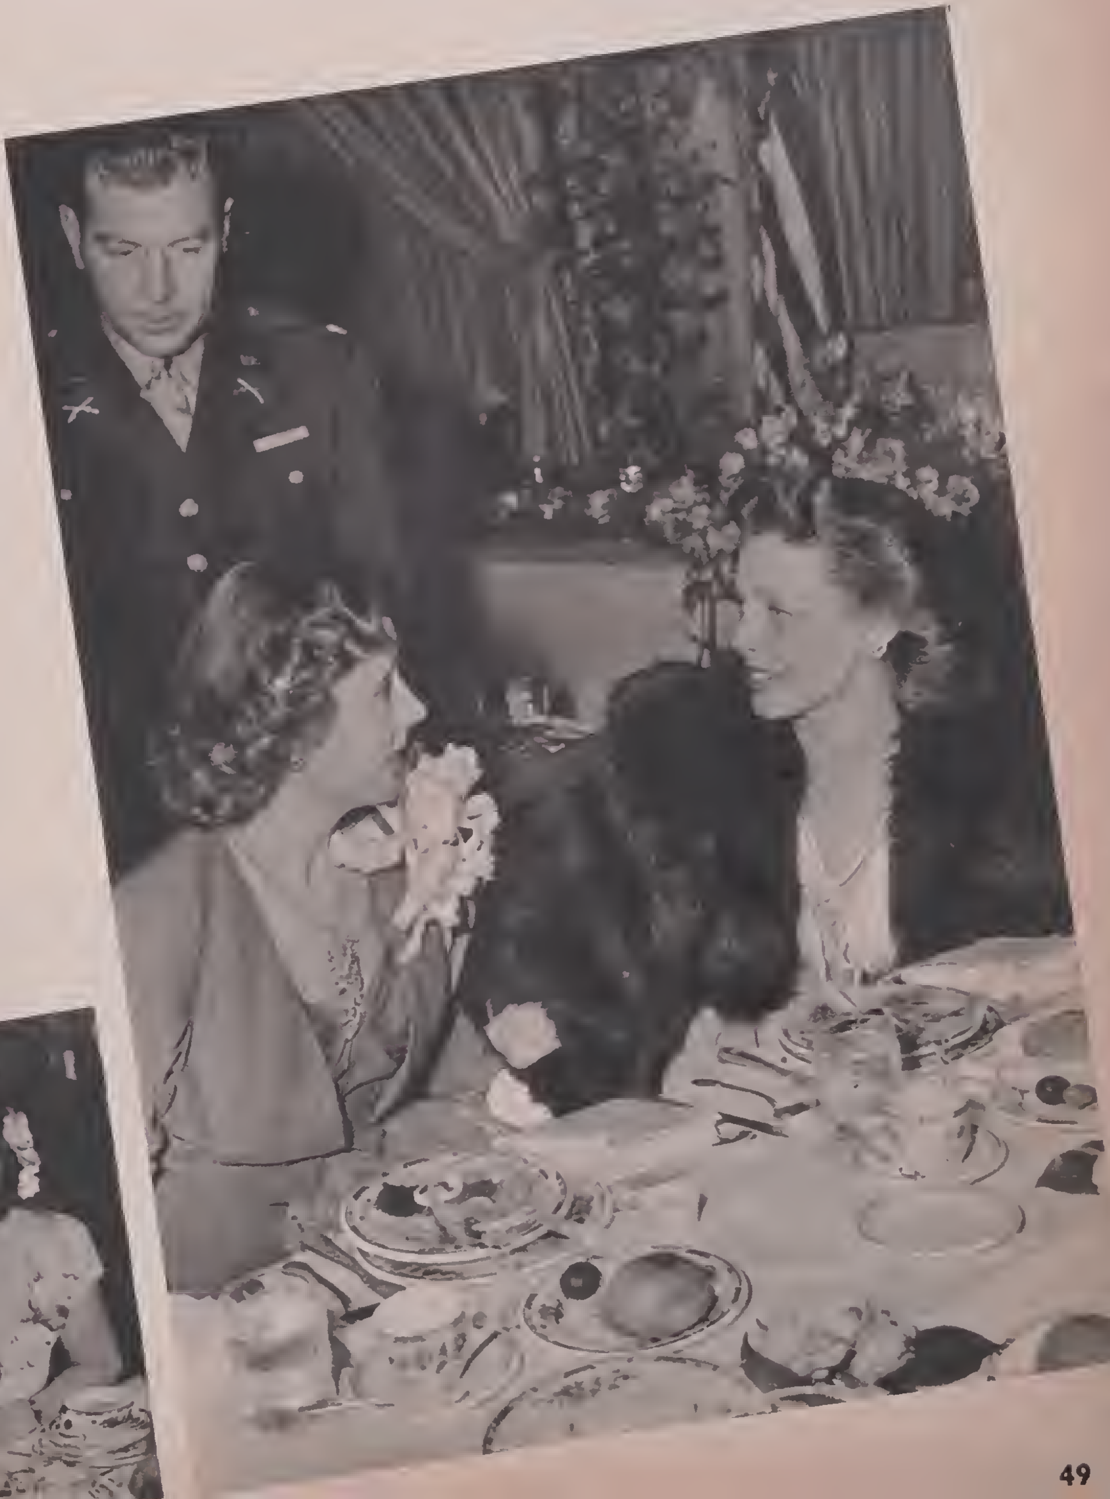
Greer's hair is parted in the middle and waved softly back, to be piled in a big, figure-8 knot, UP on the back of the head, revealing the nape of her neck.

Beauty Chatter:

As in all beauty parlors, we bring snatches of beauty gossip—short, compact, tricky, practical.

For instance, Ann Sheridan tells us she gives herself a once-weekly facial scrubbing with salt applied with a soft complexion brush . . . Judy Garland saves expenses on perfume by substituting bath oil; rubbed gently into the skin, it doesn't come off on your clothes, and the scent stays and stays and stays . . . Judy, too, thinks there's nothing better than her old-fashioned hand lotion of lemon juice and glycerine, half and half . . . Louise Allbritton uses a tiny doll's comb for eyebrow grooming. It gives them that perfect arch, smooths stubborn hairs into line . . . Keeping an eye on elbows, Veronica Lake rubs cream into hers every night before retiring to keep the skin soft and pliable . . . There are lots of tricks with perfume, and Claudette Colbert's is to put perfume over her lipstick to set it and keep it from smearing . . . Those slim and shapely ankles sported by Ida Lupino are undoubtedly due to the fact that she walks once around her house each morning—on her toes! You're right. It's not as easy as it reads . . . And Lana Turner is looking mighty beautiful these days with her hair back to its natural brown. It's hard on the fans, though, who fail to recognize her . . . If you're sporting exposed ears, it's well to follow Grace McDonald's cue and remove that shiny look by powdering behind the ears. Shine on the ears themselves can be removed with a very little bit of powder on a piece of absorbent cotton. Use cotton or your powder brush to remove any excess . . . Hand cream applied before and after immersion in water is the secret behind the lovely hands of Ingrid Bergman . . . Maybe some of those unpleasant childhood memories of castor oil will be shooed away by this little beauty secret: Dolores Moran claims that nightly brushing with castor oil promotes the growth of her eyelashes and also keeps them in proper alignment . . . And so ends this month's beauty gossip. Try them all or not, as you will. Each take so little time; each brings results.

THE END



Hairdresses are highly individual in Hollywood these days, as witness these four different types of beauties at the banquet for Madame Chiang Kai-shek. At left Janet Gaynor Adrian has her hair cut short, curled in short ringlets over the whole head. Irene Dunne parts her hair in the center, dips it softly on either side, moors it above the ears with tiny hair combs. Loretta Young sweeps her hair back severely over a crepe-hair rat, outlines her lovely, long neck. Olivia de Havilland wears a pompadour and a low coil on the back of her neck—roses to match her frock.

LOU COSTELLO'S FIGHT FOR HEALTH

LOU COSTELLO's getting well! It can be told now, how close the chubby half of the Abbott and Costello team came to that final danger of all. Now it can be told how his family, his thousands of friends, his millions of fans, feared for him. It may also be told now, how only he was never afraid, never worried, but very, very sick.

To the hundreds of thousands of boys in all the camps who have laughed at him, to all the lonely lads whom he reached, almost nightly, by short wave radio, to practically every resident of Hollywood, the news that, at long last, Lou is getting well, comes as very wonderful news indeed. He is actually recovered enough that today as he lies out in the California sun, he can actually think of his next picture, his next broadcast, and camp show.

His six-year-old daughter, Patricia Ann, is convinced that his recovery is due to a holy picture she bought for him at Marymount School. His four-year-old daughter, Carole Lou, is equally certain that Daddy's improvement comes directly through the little medal she bought. Both children saved their small allowances and invested of their own accord for their daddy's benefit. Earnestly, they took their precious gifts to his bedside and assured him that if he kept the items under his pillow all the time, he'd get well.

Bud Abbott, Lou's partner, being more worldly, is of the opinion that Lou's recovery is based on the best service medicine and science afford.

As for Mrs. Lou Costello, she believes it is because Lou is such a good patient.

"I never have to make him take his vitamins, or eat the things he's supposed to eat," she says. "Nobody has to argue with him about not getting out of bed, about resting, about giving up anything his doctors say isn't good for him. He must have steak and liver every day. He must eat at least three vegetables or salad, and he mustn't eat rich desserts or anything fattening. Now he's getting tired of the same meat every day, but he never complains. He just eyes the liver and says, 'Look at that dee-licious lamb chop!' He used to eat the tomato out of his salads and push the rest of it out of the way. He never touched any vegetable except potato. Now he eats every mouthful set before him.

"He listens to the radio a great deal and will say to his nurse: 'If I eat my Wheaties, I'll grow up to be a big strong man. Bring on the Wheaties!' Or he'll sing that song about spinach.

"He says he's going to play it the doc's way."

Well, of course, behind all this, there's the story of a great human being. Lou has never been ill. He had never consulted a doctor before this illness except for insurance examinations, so when he was stricken, the "doctor routine," as he calls it, was all new to him. Now the actor in him makes him imitate it. When he has a caller, he takes that caller's pulse and temperature and pretends to take his blood pressure. He is so funny that he and Bud have worked out a "doctor routine" for their next picture, "Harem Scarem."

Lou has had rheumatic fever. No one seems to know exactly what that is, but you have to stay in bed for it. No one apparently knows how or why the fever comes, or if they do, they haven't explained it to Lou so far. It must be a germ, says Lou, and it sneaks up on you when you're a ba-ad boy and won't go to bed with the sandman.

For months before the germ attacked him, Lou had been consistently over-working. He went from one picture to another and put in all his spare time in rehearsals, broadcasts, army shows, bond tours. If he had listened to advice, he would have taken better care of himself, but when you've always been well, you don't heed your loved ones' anxious: "Put on your hat—it's snowing!" or "Wrap up your throat, you're getting hoarse!" or "You have time to lie down for an hour or so now." You just think that's a family for you.

The snow blows in your hair, the fog gets in your throat, you let somebody's cousin bring in his little girl to shake hands, and you put on a show for the kid instead of sensibly lying down. You sign up for more shows, you think up new gags, you run around like a tizzy doing things you could let some other guy do if you stopped to think.

And you wind up with a germ conducting an invasion inside you, a doctor looking at a thermometer, and you saying: "What's the score, doc?"

Lou thought he had a charley horse the night he first noticed the pain creeping up his leg. He and Bud were giving a broadcast. Bud noticed Lou changing position frequently, easing his knee, working his leg muscles, and saw the beads of sweat forming on his forehead, but Lou finished the broadcast without incident.

That night they had intended going on to the Hollywood Masquer's Club party. Lou was president of the club and was eager to attend, but the pains had grown rapidly worse. He called up Bud and told him that, for once, he'd have to carry on alone.

"Have fun," he directed Bud. "I'll go home, stick my foot in a tub, and crawl in the hay. That'll fix it."

It didn't fix it. Next day he couldn't put his weight on the bad leg. That was Friday. In Hollywood, as you may have heard, Friday night is fight night. There never was a greater fight fan than Lou. He couldn't miss fight night. He called the studio—he still hadn't called the doctor—and asked them to send him a couple of canes. "I'm going to make like a cripple," he told them. "You know—stump, stump, stump down the ramp to the ringside."

But by night when the canes arrived, he discovered he couldn't stump even so far as across the room. He listened to the fights on his bedside radio. It was Mrs. Costello who finally sent for the doctor.

When Dr. Victor Kovner told Lou that bed was the cure for his fever, Lou said, "Okay, you're the doc!" But he didn't sleep very well. Maybe Mrs. Costello reported him. At any rate, the doctor recommended a sleeping pill.

"Nix on that stuff," said Lou, but after an argument he agreed to take one if Dr. Kovner did likewise. Dr. Kovner gulped one down. Lou gulped down another. Lou didn't shake hands with the sandman till midnight, but Dr. Kovner didn't come around to call until 2 p.m. next day. He slept straight through his ten o'clock appointment!

LOU has a miniature screen in his bedroom, and every night he sees a picture on 1t mm film. Major studios, just because they were so fond of the roly poly comedian, arranged to process pictures on this size film especially for Lou. That gave Lou a bright idea. After he saw those movies he directed their disposal among the military and naval hospitals around Hollywood and then out to our eight fighting fronts. Once a week, Lt. Frieda Levenson of the American Red Cross Motor Corps drives up to the Costello home to cart away reels of the film for distribution according to Lou's earnest sugestions.

"Buck Privates," Lou's own first screen hit, was shown to troops in Attu shortly before they chased the Japs off that vital island. Lt. Levenson reported to Lou that the boys in Attu were certain this picture helped with the victory. Remember that scene where Lou is on an icy precipice in constant danger of slipping over the edge? The troops fought on plenty of icy peaks and each time they negotiated one, they thought of the picture and Lou. They pretended to repeat his gags, and they laughed at danger.

Now whenever Lou views a film, he says, "This'll be good down in Guadalcanal!" or "The boys in Africa will go for this!" or "How about this for China?"

He's crazy about cartoon comedies and would like to send his favorites everywhere. The only thing that makes him impatient about his enforced rest is that he can't accompany Bud to hospitals, hand the boys a few laughs in person, and ask them what cartoons they prefer and whether he's choosing the right pictures.

SPENDING his long convalescence near a wide bedroom window, Lou has had an unobstructed view of the antics of a group of P-38's in training flights. They afforded him so much entertainment that he asked Mrs. Costello to invite the pilots in to look at some of his choicest films.

One night when the pilots were on hand, Bud Abbott suggested that they show the comedian's latest comedy, "Hit The Ice." The show began, the guests were convulsed, and the host lay back, well pleased. Suddenly something went wrong with the projection machine, just at the beginning of one of their best routines. Lou motioned Bud, and the two of them completed the routine in person, much to the enjoyment of the pilots.

Back at the swimming pool again. The other side of Donald Duck is a seat, and it also holds the umbrella.

This, Lou and Bud believe, was the turning point on the Costello road back to health.

Next day the airmen put their appreciation of Lou's thoughtfulness in writing—sky writing with vapor "I'm a Bad Boy" right over the Costello ranch.

THE 5-C Ranch, as Lou calls it, (5-C for the five Costellos) is a small acreage in San Fernando Valley, improved with shining light colored buildings grouped on green lawns trimmed with flowers and fruit. Lou had a finger in designing the house, and several fingers in designing play-house, swimming pool, dressing rooms, and other buildings, for "making things" is his hobby.

Now that he's in bed, he continues to pursue his hobby. He's having his former garage torn out, replacing it with a library, and building a three-car garage on the other side of the property. Lou's father is in charge of carrying out his famous son's plans in the library; so far they have built a stone fireplace, assembled knotty pine for interior finishing, hard wood for flooring, and planned a whole wall of windows across the front of the new room.

Lou designed the wing that houses his home movie theater; it doubles as a pool room when anyone wants a game.

But the playroom is his special pride—a huge room, big enough for a dance, designed to accommodate model ships, another of Lou's hobbies. The carpet is sea blue, the walls are painted sea-scapes, chairs have red ship's wheels as backs, as do the high stools at the nautical bar. Lamps are ship's bells, charts are painted on tables in red, white, and blue, and there's an aquarium full of active goldfish. Signs over doors designate the kitchen as "Galley," telephone room as "Captain's Quarters," terrace as "Outside Deck and Swimming Pool." Each model ship has its appropriate setting.

The family likes to gather in the playroom. Lou's mother says it makes her feel as if Lou might be in any minute. Lou's attitude ever since he first went to bed has been that he'll soon be well. Apparently it never occurred to him that his illness could have another ending, or that there was the slightest doubt of recovery. Perhaps that helped.

One of his ideas was to have Mrs. Costello hang a calendar, turned to the month of September, near his bed. By September, he was faithfully promised, he would be up and around again; the calendar gave him a chance to plan things to do in that lovely month.

WHILE I sat getting this story in the playroom, Patricia Ann and Carole Lou made their daily visit to their father. Lou still wasn't quite strong enough to see an outsider like myself, but the little girls came in, freckled faces glowing, ribbons on pigtails dancing. Each of them had twenty-five cents to spend on a shopping trip with their youthful Aunt Pat.

"I want to buy a camera for Daddy," announced Carole Lou.

Her aunt had forgotten where they sell cameras for twenty-five cents.

Patricia Ann was all for parting with five cents at the Brown Derby. The Brown Derby, she explained, was probably so expensive you couldn't spend less than that. Her sister marveled at any place that might refuse a penny. "They could get a marble with it," she pointed out.

They went into a conference then, counting nickels and dimes. They consulted "Uncle Bud" gravely. "Uncle Bud has made a fortune in rabbits," they told me.

"Yep. I started with two, and now I've got fifty," agreed Bud. He discouraged them, however, from investing in live stock, suggesting that something to eat might be interesting.

The little girls gave him a hug and a kiss, inquired the price of ice cream and followed their aunt to the car, comparing flavors. One of them ran back to ask whether they couldn't take some ice cream back home to Daddy.

NOT only do little daughters think of Lou in his convalescence. Brimming mailbags are left at his doorstep every day. Some letters contain home remedies for rheumatic fever. "Wear a steel ring. It will eliminate fever in a few days," reads one.

A woman in Nebraska told Lou to put a potato in his pocket. "If you don't have a pocket, pin the potato to your pajamas."

A man in Oregon wrote, "Slice two dozen onions into a quart of Scotch. Then dig a hole in your backyard and dump in the Scotch and onions. Six days later eat a teaspoonful of dirt from the hole and you'll be cured."

Other kindly people want to help. Mrs. John Lee of Cambridge, Massachusetts, sent a religious memento that has been in her family for generations. Whenever a noted person has a serious illness, Mrs. Lee sends it to him with a request for its return upon his recovery. Lou is the first movie star to receive the memento.

Champion child baton twirler, thirteen-year-old Irene Ehrlich of Miami, Florida, idolizes the roly-poly comic. Last week she auctioned off an autographed picture of Abbott and Costello at Miami's Exchange Club. She wrote:

"It should make you feel good to know the first offer for your picture wasn't twenty-five dollars or fifty dollars, but a five-hundred-dollar bond. It went to six hundred, seven hundred dollars, one thousand, two thousand, five thousand, six thousand, seven thousand and ten thousand dollars in a few minutes. You rest and take good care of yourself, and I'll keep selling bonds for you with more of your pictures."

The largest letter of sympathy came from a thousand boys in an infantry battalion training near Indio, California. Writing paper being unavailable, the soldiers used the bottom of a paper carton eighteen by twelve inches. The message reads:

"Hurry up and get well, Lou.
Here's hoping that you do.
Bring to us both mirth and joy
And your shy 'I'm a Bad Boy!'"

"How could any guy lie here and pity himself when he has people like these pulling for him?" demands Lou, his moon face beaming. "I'll be out of bed in September, maybe August. Our next radio program begins in October—everything's signed up ready to go—and our next picture goes into work in November. Why, I'm hitting on all cylinders! I'm a lucky Joe!"

"THIS IS THE ARMY"

—in Hollywood

BY BARRY STARR

WITHOUT fanfare, without publicity, and without trumpets, the Army detrained at Burbank, California, got into formation and started swiftly marching west on Olive Street. The Army was about to make its first feature movie.

Mighty G-2, which is Army Intelligence, has frowned upon any individual publicity for any of the men in the Irving Berlin troupe, so for the purposes of the record, let this be the story of Pfc. Jones, late of New York City, and the only real Jones among the three hundred and fifty who had for more than a year nightly been singing "This is the Army, Mr. Jones." It is impossible, because of regulations, to identify Pfc. Jones beyond his last name. But this is the story of his adventures in Bagdad-on-the-Los-Angeles-River.

Pfc. Jones strode down Olive Street in Burbank, in full field equipment, the full three and one-half miles to Warner Bros. studio. The War Department considered the movement of the organization just as much a military secret as the invasion of North Africa, so while Warner Bros. knew he and his buddies were coming, they didn't know exactly when.

Somehow the impression had got around that the "This Is the Army" company was made up of a lot of Broadway actors, singers, and musicians who had been drafted for the sole purpose of putting on an Army show. That was far from the case.

Many of the men among the three hundred and fifty had been in the Army for two and one-half years before Berlin had ever been approached with the request that he repeat his "Yip, Yip Yaphank" success of 1918. Others were only recent inductees. But all had had regular Army training. And they are still getting it.

Inside the studio Pfc. Jones and his cohorts marched grimly to the main patio before they were given the "At ease!" order. Then they were issued their instructions. The picture would not start for a few days. They would find living quarters for themselves—a list of possibilities had been prepared—as quickly as possible. They would report for duty daily at a designated portion of then vacant land. Then they were dismissed.

"Gosh," said Pfc. Jones, "do you think we'll really get to see how pictures are made?"

"Of course, you dope," answered his next-in-line. "You're IN a picture!"

Well, maybe Pfc. Jones did find out how pictures were made. If he did, however, it is a minor miracle.

For first Jones and his buddies were put to work clearing that piece of vacant property. There they constructed "Camp Tita"—pronounced "Tie-ta" with the initials standing for "This Is the Army." They set up barracks and a headquarters tent. They built an obstacle course, a rifle range, and a boxing ring. They even constructed a small theater where they could

THE MOVIES GO TO WAR

Of course, there's a 1917 sequence in the movie plot, and leading plotters in that are Charlie Butterworth, George Tobias, Alan Hale, and George Murphy.

Top above—The lads who played in the movie version of "This Is the Army" had to live up to regulations at all times. Here you see their morning arrival at the Warner Studio. Bottom above—The actor-soldiers dreamed of glamour —but this is what they got—that old tent routine, even if they were stationed on the Warner back lot.

Here's old Father White Christmas himself, the mighty Irving Berlin, who conceived, composed, created "This Is the Army" and all for Army charity, too.

The spot wasn't big enough to accommodate all of the three hundred and fifty actors, singers, and musicians, which was the reason for the order to find living accommodations eleswhere. For the most part these were quickly arranged, and transportation problems solved.

Pfc. Jones found himself established, with three other men from the show, in a two-bedroom apartment in Hollywood, priced at seventy-five dollars a month. That made it a tight financial squeeze between the ration and housing allotment that each man receives.

"It worked out comfortably," said Pfc. Jones, "depending upon how many free meals we get invited to." Pfc. Jones grinned. "I didn't do too badly."

He soon discovered that whatever Hollywood and motion picture studios might be to anyone else, they were a mystery and a job of work to him. He was marched to the sound stage on which he was to work each morning. He left it only for lunch. He wasn't allowed on any other stage. He didn't meet any actors. He couldn't even speak to Joan Leslie, who plays the love interest in the story Hollywood wrote to tie "Yip, Yip Yaphank" up with "This Is the Army." He just stood and looked.

He also worked. Camp Tita was no sham or window-dressing. Pfc. Jones reported there each morning not later than eight-thirty a.m., and frequently earlier. The Officer of the Day read the orders: so many men to report to Stage 2 for rehearsals on "I Left My Heart at the Stage-door Canteen;" so many men to report to Stage 22 for pre-recording "Mandy;" so many men to go through bayonet drill for the cameras; and so many men to police Camp Tita.

If they weren't working for Director Michael Curtiz or one of his numerous aides, the Army had plenty of official work for them to do. They did everything from work out on the Commando training course they built themselves to shining three hundred and fifty pairs of shoes.

They also stood guard at night at Camp Tita. Just as at a real Army post. Curious things happened, as things will. For instance, there was the dark and stormy night when a nervous sentry, in full equipment, was standing his post when Cameron Shipp, the Warner Bros. publicity man in charge of the unit handling the show publicity, approached.

"Halt!" challenged the sentry in true Army tradition. "Who goes there, Cameron Shipp?"

The boys had strict orders that they were not permitted to speak to any motion picture actor or actress, they were not allowed to go on any stage except the one on which they were actually at work, they were not permitted to loiter on the studio grounds, and in fact were not even admitted unless they were on call.

Pfc. Jones and his buddies did find one way of talking to Miss Leslie, however. They were pretty steady visitors at the Hollywood Canteen, and Joan makes frequent appearances there. Not knowing of the "no talk" order at the studio, Joan was hurt when some of the boys she had danced with one night declined to give her more than a brief grin of recognition the following day.

Joan was mollified, however, when a lieutenant brought her a note, signed by the entire company, in which the men designated her as the "actress we'd most like to meet." Joan also suspects them of being responsible for sending a bugler to her home at five-thirty a.m. to blow reveille — which aroused the entire neighborhood—the day Joan was to start work in the picture.

Several other actors and actresses worked in the picture along with Miss Leslie. These included Lt. Ronald Reagan, who was given leave from his Army duties to appear in the film, George Murphy, George Tobias, Alan Hale, Charles Butterworth, Una Merkel, and various others. Kate Smith, Frances Langford, and Greta Neissen appeared to do specialty numbers of Berlin tunes, the redoubtable Miss Smith giving forth with "God Bless America."

Berlin originally wrote this song for "Yip, Yip Yaphank," decided it wasn't very good, and didn't use it.

The lads weren't allowed to speak to Frances Langford or Joan Leslie, while they were working with them.

Kate Smith refused all billing, all pay, for singing "God Bless America" in the film.

Not until Miss Smith asked him, two or three years ago, for a stirring patriotic song, did the world hear it. The rest is history.

Nevertheless Pfc. Jones and his pals had quite a bit of fun in Hollywood, in-between working periods. They hadn't had a furlough in seven months when they hit the film capital. The Berlin show had opened in New York on July 4, 1942, and the men had been either performing or traveling since that date, giving regular shows and two to five appearances in Army camps weekly.

They didn't have a real furlough in Hollywood, but they did manage to squeeze out a few hours for themselves here and there to see the sights. The Canteen was Private Jones' favorite hangout, although he did get to the Derby, Ciro's, and other popular spots once or twice.

"It was sort of disappointing," relates Private Jones. "There weren't many movie stars to look at. Most of 'em are on bond tours or camp shows, or they've only got 'A' gas cards. I saw more swing-shift workers than actors."

Biggest laugh of the picture work didn't happen in Hollywood at all. It came at Fort MacArthur, an Army induction center at San Pedro, some twenty-five miles from Los Angeles, where Director Michael Curtiz took part of his company for some location shots.

Mike wanted some scenes of some new selectees actually arriving in camp for the first time. A parcel of newcomers from Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama were just being issued their first uniforms that day.

They were, says Private Jones, slightly awed about their induction. They were completely flabbergasted by the fact that they were to be photographed—and by a real Hollywood film company.

One tall, raw-boned Kentuckian flatly refused to be photographed wearing his G. I. uniform.

"Nothin' doin'," he insisted. "If Maw happened to see this here picture and saw me standin' around in front of all these people in just my drawers, she'd yank me right out of this Army before I had a chance to shoot any Japs!"

Pfc. Jones suffered the comparative hardship of eating breakfast in a neighborhood drug store, lunch in the studio commissary, and dinner where he could find it. All of his two dollars and eighty-eight cents daily allotment went for food and rent.

"Gosh," said Pfc. Jones, "I'd sure like to get back to some of that real Army chow. I've been eating in restaurants ever since we've been on tour. And doing that Commando course on just an omelet on meatless Tuesday ain't fun!"

Pfc. Jones wasn't able to supply his girl back in New York with a picture of himself shaking hands with Humphrey Bogart because he was not allowed to be photographed with any of the stars. He was in production stills in which he actually worked with a Hollywood star, but he usually, then, was just part of the background.

Lt. Ronald Reagan plays a principal role, but the Army won't allow photographs of him published that are taken from the film. This is Ronnie "as is" off screen these days.

Warner Bros, isn't making any profit out of "This is the Army." The show raised about two million dollars for Army Emergency Relief on tour, and the picture ought to get about ten million. Everything above the actual cost of the picture goes to the AER fund. The studio got the film rights to the stage show in spectacular fashion. Many studios were making offers to Berlin for the privilege of putting the show on film. The morning following the New York opening, Jack L. Warner, executive producer at his studio, phoned Berlin long-distance.

"Irving," he said, "what do you want for the show?"

Berlin, a notoriously late riser (he wasn't kidding when he wrote "Oh, How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning"), yawned sleepily and said, "At least two hundred and fifty thousand."

"It's a deal," snapped Warner. "I'll mail the check immediately—and every cent of profit goes to the Army Emergency Relief. All we want is our production cost."

It was mentioned earlier that Pfc. Jones—the unidentifiable unit who represents every man of the three hundred and fifty—was a singer. That's true. Also in the group, you'll find musicians who played with Glen Gray, Benny Goodman, Glenn Miller, and the like. You'll find "Stump" of "Stump and Stumpy" who wanted to know, when he landed in the show, if he could be billed as "Stump Without Stumpy." Then there's the cellist who toured South America with Leopold Stokowski; a ballet expert who danced with Pavlova; not to mention a former bartender, an ex-chiropractor, and an undertaker's assistant. "This Is the Army" is made up of men from all walks of life, just as is the Army of the United States.

Pfc. Jones didn't mention it, but despite G-2, it has become known that there are quite a few celebrities in the cast of "This Is the Army." There is, for example, Ezra Stone, the original Henry Aldrich, who holds a sergeant's rank and who assisted Berlin with the production. Sons of Victor Moore, Ernest Truex, and Joe Cook are in the show. Then there is Sgt. Joseph Louis Barrows—otherwise Joe Louis, world's heavyweight boxing champion—who certainly was more frightened by the cameras than he ever was by Max Schmeling, Max Baer, Lou Nova, or any of the other heavyweights whom he conquered so easily in the ring.

But in "This Is the Army" there are just three hundred and fifty men, assigned to specific duties and tasks. No individuals, no personalities, no stars.

"And I'll bet," said Pfc. Jones, "this is the only picture in the history of Hollywood where every actor knew just what every other actor was being paid—fifty dollars per month, base."

PIDGEON'S practically

WE'RE SURE YOU'LL SAY SO AFTER READING THIS INTIMATE YARN ON THE WITTY WALTER

BY KITTY CALLAHAN

IN HOLLYWOOD they say Walter Pidgeon is an enigma. They say he is a hermit. They say . . . But what's the difference what they say? Walter Pidgeon is a law unto himself in Hollywood.

Anyone who doesn't fit into the prescribed pattern or mold ordained by the powers that be is an enigma. (Editor's note: see story on Charles Boyer, page 24, line 21.) The pattern for an actor who is star material is, that he be ambitious to the point of striving to get his name in top billing above other actors; that he chafe under inferior parts and be aggressive in demanding meaty roles; and after a time, if his demands are not met at one studio, he may be expected to seek greener fields under the banner of another studio.

Walter Pidgeon never indulged in any of these little subterfuges, but he was no enigma.

He was buried under a ton of highly publicized male stars on his home lot, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. He was overshadowed by Clark Gable, Spencer Tracy, Mickey Rooney, and Robert Taylor. But it is significant that he was temporarily content to remain in the middle of the stream; that he didn't grouse or grumble about inferior pictures; that he didn't boast he could play a part as well or better than his rival contemporaries if they just gave him an opportunity to show his stuff. Walter didn't resent his place in the studio scheme of things. He made friends of everyone on the lot from the newest grip to the big boss himself. Everyone liked him though they couldn't understand his attitude. That's what made him an enigma to Hollywood.

Of his attitude, Walter says, "I can't take myself seriously, whether I'm a success or a failure. I like to think I have developed a philosophy of life to keep me on an even keel through good times and bad, but it's probably closer to the truth to say that my ego was so completely deflated during the long spell of getting knocked around Hollywood that it's incapable of ever swelling again."

That's another thing Walter's coworkers couldn't understand in him. He has no ego. Self assurance—yes, lots of that. But no ego. It was his own self assurance that kept him on the scene when success seemed to be passing him by.

Walter has his own creed for success. You must work hard, study, practice, be sure you're good; then, when the break comes, you'll be ready for it. He has an unusual quality of take-it-as-it-comes in his make-up. He isn't superstitious. He'll walk under a ladder or stop to let a black cat cross his path, but he does believe that luck runs in cycles, and for your lucky break you must depend on your lucky cycle.

That "long spell of getting knocked around" involved not only being buried under a host of MGM luminaries for four years, but stretched back for seventeen years when Walter was in and out of Hollywood. He was discovered three times and brought to the West Coast to become a motion picture star. But the star never took until two years ago when a rival studio, Twentieth Century-Fox, borrowed him and starred him in "Man Hunt" with Joan Bennett.

On each of those three occasions when Walter was discovered he thought he had hit his lucky cycle, but the cycle never ran its course. It stopped in the middle.

Of his latest and most complete lucky cycle which began in 1940, Walter does not say, "At last they found out how good I am and have given me the parts I deserve."

He says this: "Every other leading man was busy, and I was the only one available. Before that I had settled into a groove that was comfortable if not brilliant, usually being cast as the other man—the one who never got the girl. Once in a while a good role came along, but not often enough to give me delusions of grandeur."

With great roles, superbly played, in two consecutive Academy Award pictures, "How Green Was My Valley" for 1941, and "Mrs. Miniver" for 1942, Walter still has no delusions of grandeur.

Modesty as opposed to boastfulness is another practically unknown quantity in Hollywood and another facet of the Pidgeon personality that labels him different from most actors.

As to the Hollywood legend of Walter's being a hermit, that would imply that he is anti-social. He isn't. He is one of the most social guys in Hollywood in his own way. Most actors seek their friends among other actors with whom they have common interests and can talk shop. Walter doesn't. His intimate friends are beyond the pale of the motion picture studios for he has interests that take him far afield.

For one thing, Walter is an accomplished pianist, and though you never hear him sing in motion pictures any more, his early fame was gained singing in musical revues with Elsie Janis. When he signed his contract with MGM in 1936, he insisted upon a clause specifying that he would not have to sing. That clause is another vagary of Pidgeon. It is as though Fred Astaire refused to sign a contract that called for him to dance in a picture.

But Walter had been all through the cinema mill of trying to become an outstanding singing star on his two previous assaults upon Hollywood, when straight actors and leading men got the plums of picture roles while he waited around

Hollywood doesn't know too well the off-screen Pidgeon, and neither does it understand too well the on-screen Pidgeon, who grows a beard for Mr. Curie to cooling his heels until a suitable singing part was being found for him. Although, offscreen, Walter would rather play and sing than eat, he won't sing in a picture.

He never needs to call upon mood when he's in front of the camera to prepare him for a role, but he does admit that symphonic music is his greatest inspiration while he's working a role out. He has an extensive library of records of all the great symphonic masterpieces, which he plays constantly.

Other motion picture celebrities may bask in the light of cinema society, but when Walter received an invitation to attend the Music Festival at Carmel, the ultimate in social prestige had been reached for him. The Music Festival is an annual pilgrimage made by many of the finest musicians in the land, whose attendance is by invitation only. It might be called a jam session of the maestros. To Walter it was a high spot in his life.

Musing upon it he says, "That music, under the California sky, was enough to make you drunk on the beauty of it."

And upon another occasion, Walter captured one of those never-to-be-forgotten moments when, in Chicago on a rainy day, he happened to be passing the Auditorium and saw the lobby displays advertising Sergei Rachmaninoff's appearance with the Chicago Symphony. The performance had already begun, and Walter knew the house would have been sold out long since. Nevertheless, he approached the ticket window, and his lucky cycle was working. He bought the only seat to be had, a single which had been turned back just before the curtain.

Seated high in the balcony, Walter saw, heard, and drank in the exquisite music of one of the world's greatest pianists playing one of his own great compositions and Walter's favorite — the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 2 in C minor. Those are experiences Walter wouldn't exchange for the most star-studded, big-wig party in Hollywood, and that sets him apart from the majority of cinema personnel. But he is no hermit.

Another Hollywood myth which Walter Pidgeon blasted is that to get to the top the newcomer must kow-tow to the right people. Walter didn't kow-tow even in the earliest days of his bombardment. Proponents of the idea might argue that Walter would have reached stardom years sooner had he played the Hollywood game, but to Walter that would not have been being true to oneself.

The story of Walter's first assault upon the cinema capital is well known, when in 1926, after a successful tour of the United States and England with Elsie Janis, he was signed to a motion picture contract. The salary was exciting, but during the long delay in finding the right part to introduce him to the public, Walter was restless and unhappy.

Then he went to a party. It was a large party with the guests milling about at the home of the late James Cruze, then one of the industry's top directors. Perhaps twenty were invited. Fifty came. All you had to do in those days of largesse was know someone who knew someone who knew . . . You seldom met your host, and he didn't know you from Adam.

That was in the puttee era when directors wore riding breeches and leather leggings, and bellowed through a megaphone. The director who could bellow the loudest held some claim to distinction, provided of course that his pictures were box-office. James Cruze could bellow—but loud.

Some of the guests were in. The rest were on the fringe. During the evening they put on their acts; showed off their talents like bric-a-brac in an ormolu cabinet. They did their stunts and kept the party going, something like singing for your supper.

Walter sang. He received his modicum of applause then found a deep chair, stretched his long legs before him, lighted his ever present pipe, and prepared to endure the entertainment of the others.

It was then his host, James Cruze, sought him out. Cruze, never one to pull his punches said, "You're everything I don't like in a man."

"Is that so?" Walter quirked an eyebrow, and his mouth curved in a mocking smile.

"Yeah," said Cruze. "You smoke a stinkin' pipe, and you're a vegetarian."

"So what?" challenged Walter.

Cruze, who could admire forthrightness in others as well as dish it out himself, said, "So you can have the lead in my next picture." The picture was "Mannequin" with Dolores Costello.

It is notable that even then, when Walter was hungering for a part, he didn't offer to placate Cruze by apologizing for the offending pipe. And what other directors thought or didn't think of his pipe since then has never mattered to Walter. His pipe collection has grown from a modest few to a cherished four hundred. Off the screen you seldom see him without one of them clenched between his teeth or cradled in his hand.

Nor did Walter justify his vegetarian diet by explaining the reasons for it to the redoubtable Cruze. He is no diet faddist. His vegetarian regimen was prescribed by his brother, who is a doctor, after Walter suffered a severe illness some years ago. As long as he sticks to it, he enjoys glowing health, and Walter does not underestimate that priceless treasure.

He learned the valuable lesson while he was just a youth under training in the Canadian Field Artillery during the first World War. He was crushed between two gun carriages and while recovering from his injuries, complications set in which caused pneumonia and tuberculosis. Walter spent long months in a hospital, being dismissed only one month before the Armistice. Thus Walter will stick to his vegetables as long as they spell health for him, but you have to get the reasons from someone other than him.

There have been other instances when Walter stood pat on being true to his own convictions, refusing to soft-soap the right people, right up to the time of his signing his latest renewal of contract with Louis B. Mayer.

At that time, Walter and his manager, another brother (Walter has four brothers) had been closeted with the MGM head man in Mayer's office. They had dickered for an hour over terms of the contract, and all details were agreed except the actual figures of the weekly stipend.

Finally, in a deadlock, Walter said, "L. B., I don't know whether you know it or not, but you and I attended the same Alexandria school in St. John, New Brunswick. I'll leave it to you to meet my figure or toss you a coin for the difference."

Walter got the salary that he wanted.

Among sports, football is Walter's favorite, and he enjoys squiring his lovely daughter, Edna, to games and watching the envious glances of young blades as they appraise him, not knowing she is his daughter. Their association is very close. Edna's mother died when she was born. Edna calls him Pidge. He calls her Little Pidge.

At a preview of one of his pictures to which he took Edna, Walter watched himself perform on the screen. "He's a handsome snob, isn't he?" he said sotto voce, but not sotto voce enough not to be overheard by the woman next to him.

"Listen, you homely mud turtle," the stranger turned upon him, "if you were half as handsome as Mr. Pidgeon you might get a job as an undertaker."

Walter's equilibrium had almost returned when they left the theater, and he was besieged by women autograph hunters. Obligingly, he stopped and signed the scraps of paper held out to him. Edna waited patiently for a time, standing first on one foot then on the other, until she could not endure it a second longer.

"Daddy, come on," she demanded, impatiently.

The women looked from the suave, urbane Pidgeon to the tall young woman. Walter shrugged, smiled in that lifted eyebrow smile, half amusement, half deprecation, excused himself, and joined his daughter.

As they walked to the car, Walter said, "Why the Daddy now? What's the matter with Pidge?"

"I'll always call you Daddy when you keep me waiting like that. All those women! It's a good thing to deflate you a bit."

Other women may sigh over the tall, dark and handsome Walter Pidgeon, but both the women of his family maintain a sane perspective on his great popularity.

For instance, his role in "White Cargo" with Hedy Lamarr demanded that Walter grow a beard, and quite a beard it grew to be after forty days. Mrs. Pidgeon (Walter married Ruth Walker, a nonprofessional, in 1931) stood his unkempt appearance as long as she could, then announced that she was going to take the long deferred vacation that she had promised herself.

"Your public may be able to take that crop on your face," she told Walter, "but I can't. Let me know when you shave it off, and I'll be back."

Walter has tried to shun the usual publicity which attaches itself to Hollywood personalities. Particularly distasteful to him is the sort of inquiring opinion that purports to reveal his preference on this and that.

On a recent bond-selling tour the question, "Who is your favorite motion picture actress?" frequently put by reporters who interviewed him at the many towns where the bond caravan stopped, made him shudder. Not until he was back at the studio did he find the answer.

While seated in a studio official's office one day, his eye was caught by a framed picture on the wall. That sardonic smile came to his face and he said, "Ah. That's the answer."

"The answer? The answer to what?" the official asked.

"The answer to 'Who's your favorite motion picture actress?' There she is. Elsie, the Cow."

And there you have it—refutation to the challenge that Walter Pidgeon is an enigma; that he is a hermit. He is an individualist. He is the exception that proves the rule; he knew where he was going, and arrived at the top by leaping the hurdles in his own, particular, amused way.

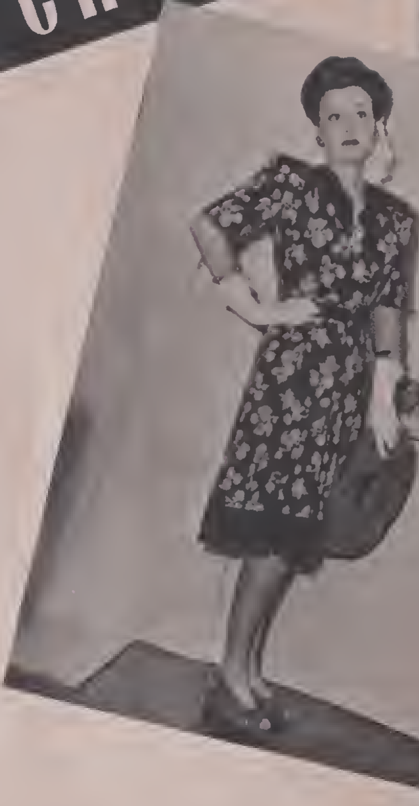
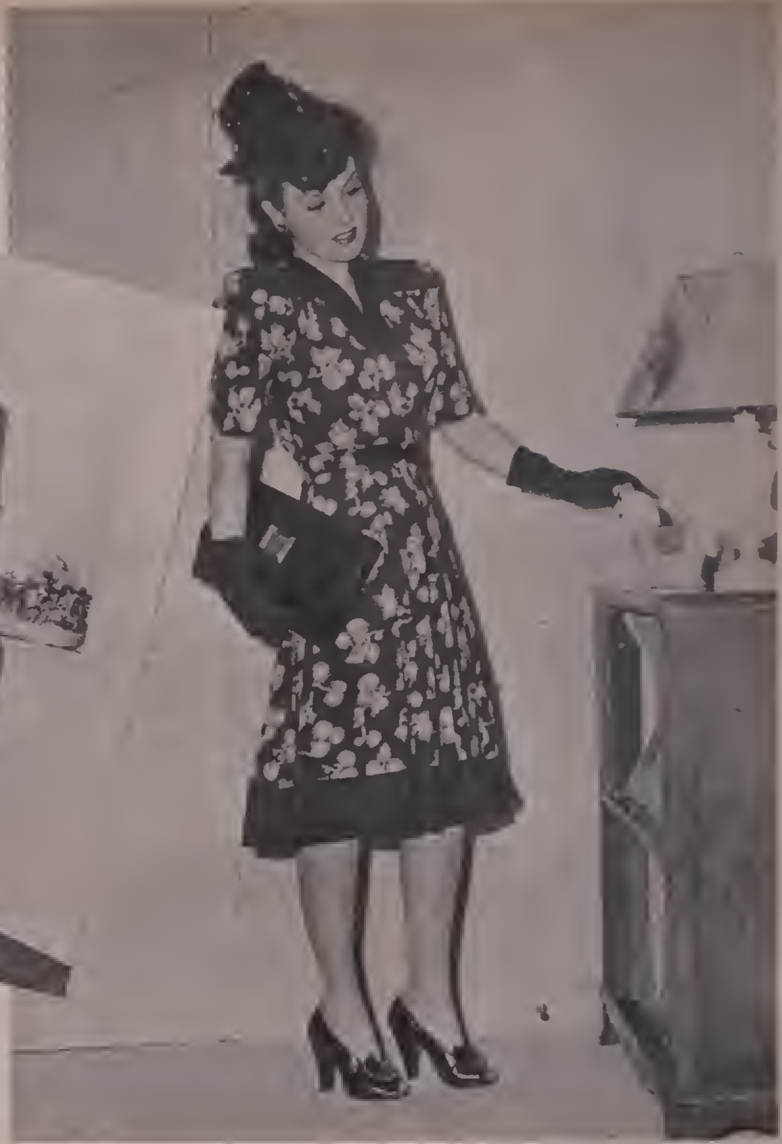
CHIC OR CHICK

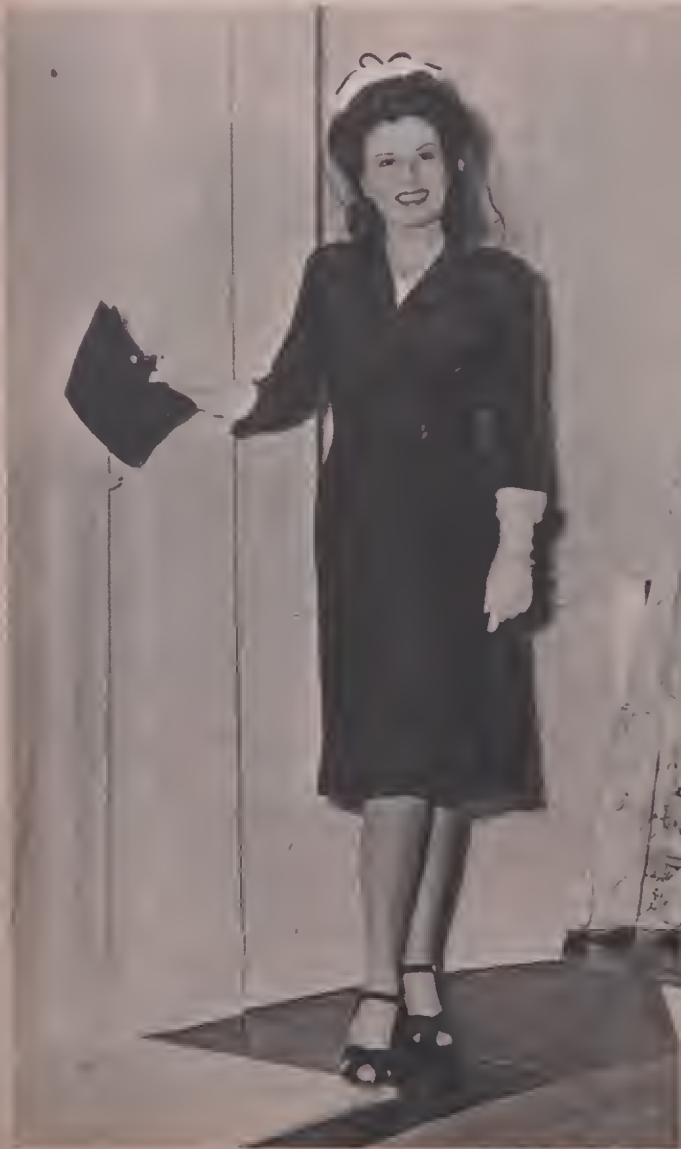
WITH pretty Sheila Ryan as our cooperative model, we set out to prove one of our pet theories. Just as when you haven't been around a lot, you may pronounce chic as though it were short for chicken (only to have some uppity clerk make you feel like dirt by murmuring "sheik" all over the place as though she were a lineal descendant of those boys from Araby), just so you may think it's money that makes you well dressed. The dollars help, all right, but it's your good sense that makes you really dressed.

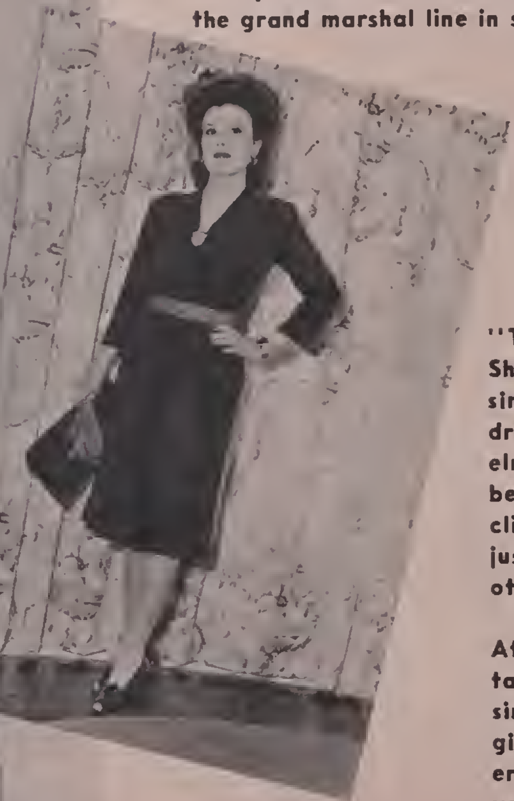




As look here at the above left. Sheila has a perfectly beautiful print spoiled with the wrong accessories, gim-crack bracelets and ring, a snood, good grief! Wedgies and a bag with too big a buckle! "Couldn't be worse," says Sheila—and looks it.

But look to the right of that! A black back-ground with brilliant cerise print, bordered in black, and worn with patent black accessories. Smooth and solid! And the grand marshal line in shredded patent leather hat!

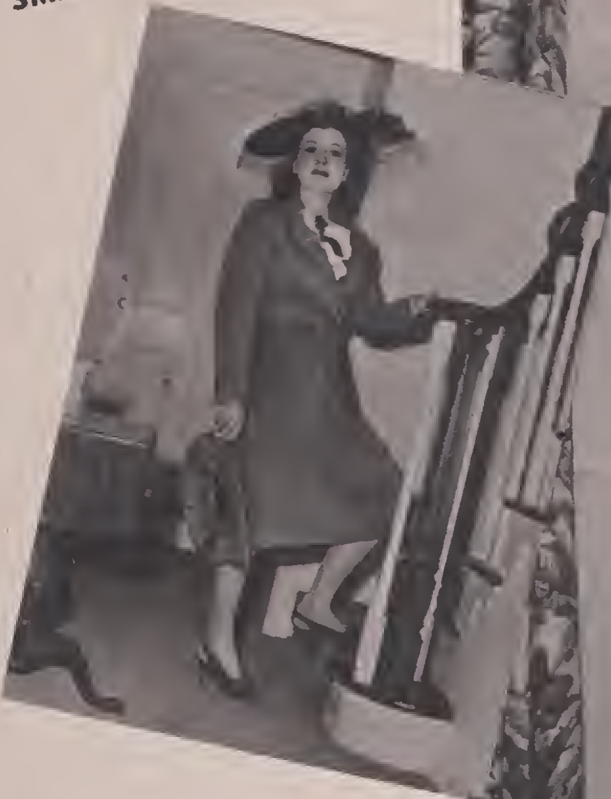


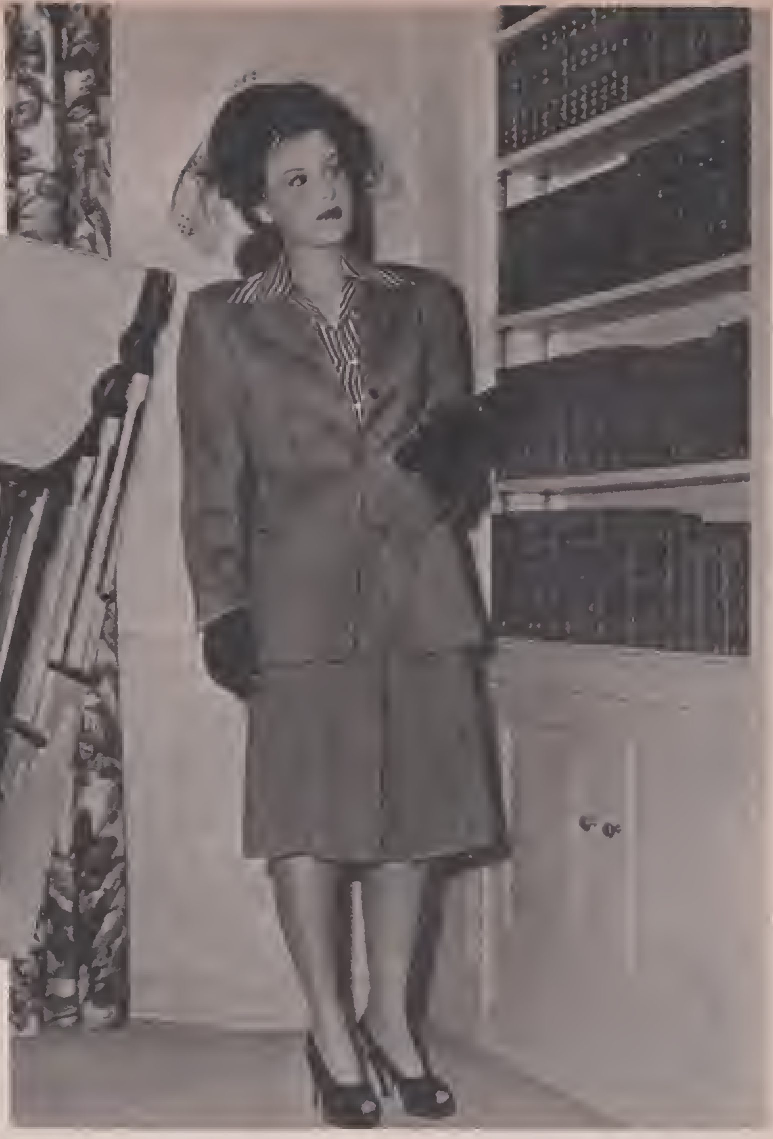


"THIS IS MURDER," says Sheila at the near left—a so simple, beautifully cut black dress all gobbed up with jewelry. Look at the stones in the belt, and then the bracelet, clip, and earrings. The hat just contributes horror to an otherwise overdone ensemble.

At the far left—This is good taste! The same dress with simple accompaniment. White gloves accent the white flowered hat which has a black veil tied with black velvet bows. Pearl bracelet, throat strand, and earrings. Just right.

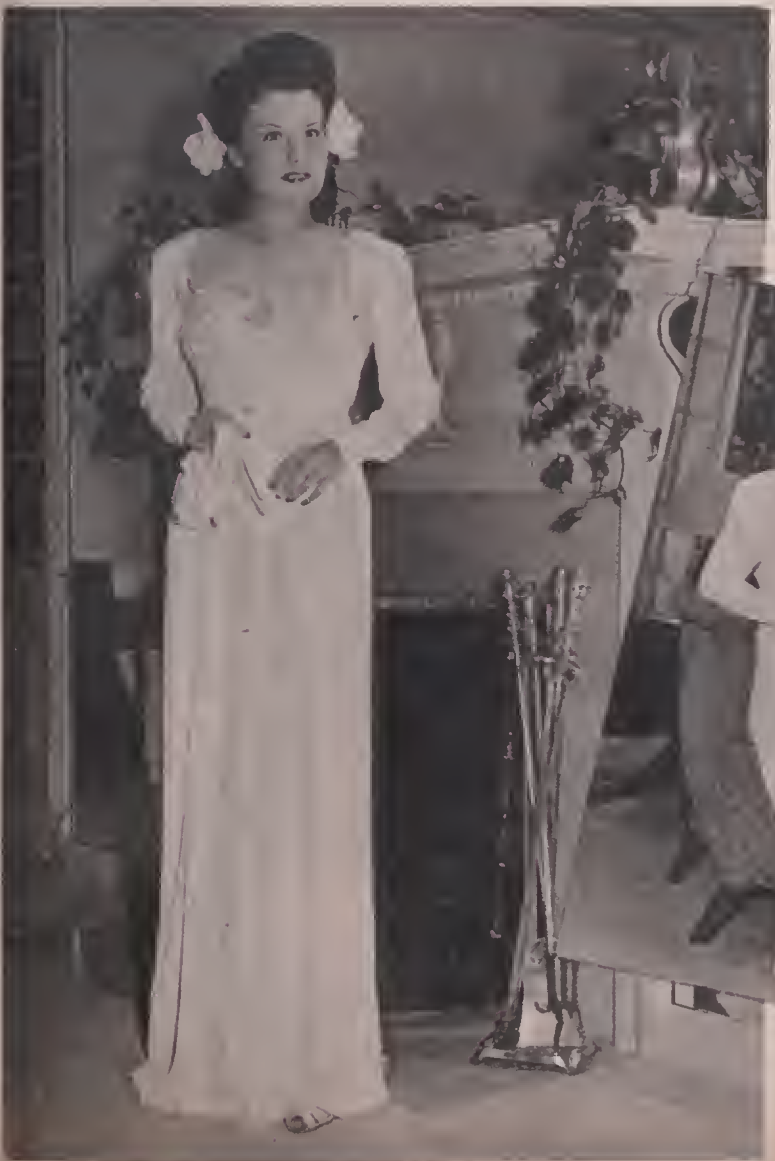
PROVING EVEN THE SMARTEST GOWN CAN LOOK TACKY —IF A GIRL ISN'T SMART, TOO

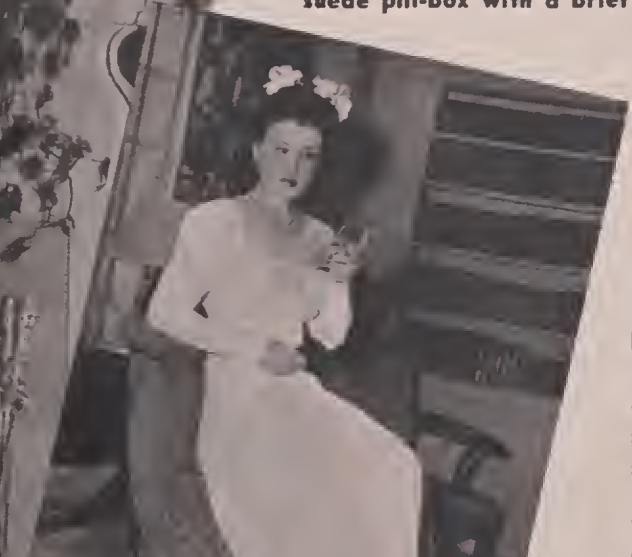




Above left—the sad and pathetic story of a beautifully tailored suit RUINED by wrong accessories. Never that fussy blouse or hat—and horrors the bag and shoes which have no rhythm. And again that hat!

Above—Sheila Ryan in that mole-skin wool gabardine with a chocolate and ivory striped shirt, chocolate suede gloves, bag, and gold-nail shoes. A brown suede pill-box with a brief veil to spell P-E-R-F-E-C-T.





DON'T DO THIS (at the near left)—a wide necklace with a dress as shimmeringly feminine as this one. Besides it spoils the suntan neckline, which is veddy sexy—as everyone can see.

The Right of It is like this: Sheila, lovely in all white crepe with floral applique on flesh-colored net to enhance the bust and neckline. Flowers in her hair, and the right accessories—long white gloves and evening bag. Irresistible.

THE PERSONAL DIARY OF Mrs. Van Heflin

JANUARY 8, 1942.

I'm ashamed of myself. Here I am, Frances Neal, free white and twenty—and red-headed, so I should know my own mind—and I'm sitting here late at night thinking of breaking my engagement just because a stranger told me to! I must be crazy.

I met him at a dinner party tonight at my fiance's house. He's Van Heflin, a young actor at MGM who's thin and blond and tall—much taller than he looks on the screen. But that's beside the point. The point is, he sat all during dinner staring quietly at me out of his gray eyes and stirring salt in his coffee. (Salt is what I said.) After dinner he unwrapped his long legs from around his chair and spoke practically his first words. He asked me to help him make a pot of coffee in the kitchen.

I said, "All right," and we went out there and put some water in the drip pot (and found out later we'd forgotten to put any coffee in it!), and while the water boiled, he asked me all about myself. I told him. I explained that I came from Texas and I'd worked in Chicago and New York, modeling and acting. And that now here I was in Hollywood, acting in the movies and also planning my coming marriage.

"Don't be too sure of that," said this Van Heflin. Then he ran his fingers through his curly blond hair, took a deep breath, and talked for one solid hour. In brief, he said I ought to make sure I wanted to marry before I did it—that I shouldn't rush into things; and above all, that I should go out with other people.

"If you decide to do that, I wish you'd let me know," he said, as if that were the end of his speech.

And I, fool that I am, am all upset over that. I am bothered over a stranger's opinions! What does he know?

But, as a matter of fact, what do I know?

February 1, 1942.

Well, I've broken my engagement. I am now a free agent again. Why, I don't know. Goodnight.

P.S. However, you may be sure that bossy Van Heflin had nothing to do with it!

April 15, 1942.

I've met Van again. After four months. But it's just the same—only more so.

Dorothy and Joe Pasternak asked me out to their ranch for the week end, and we drove out here about six this evening. Neither of them told me they'd asked some one else, too, and when we pulled up by the veranda and saw a loose-jointed lanky blond man sitting there waiting for us, my heart did the funniest flip-over it's ever done in its life. It was Van, all right.

We had a wonderful long dinner, and afterwards we pulled up chairs

Here's Van . . . and the very new baby . . . seen through the eyes of a woman in love in front of the fire and Van started talking, as if he were talking only to me. He talked for hours. He told all about his life—his childhood in Oklahoma City and his youth in Long Beach, California. And how he's always been crazy about the sea. It seems he was a sailor for years between sessions at Oklahoma University and afterwards—on trips to Honolulu, South America, Europe, the South Sea Islands—and then suddenly he wanted to be an actor. So he went to the Yale Workshop and then to Broadway. Everyone knows he played the reporter in "Philadelphia Story" on the stage, of course—and that was what landed him in Hollywood two years ago.

He's thirty-two, twelve years older than I am. He's much smarter than I'll ever be—he knows all about painting and history and literature and people . . . and I think he's perfectly wonderful.

But will I ever know what he thinks of me?

April 16, 1942.

It's Sunday evening and I'm back home at Mother's again in Hollywood, and feeling blue. Oh, today was marvelous—Van and I, riding and walking all over the Pasternak's ranch, having a huge Sunday barbecue lunch, and then driving home, stopping at the Little Troc for dinner.

Van and I found out so many astounding things about each other. (1) Both our fathers are dentists. (2) We lived two doors from each other in New York for two years and never met. (3) We ate breakfast in the same corner drug store every morning there and never met.

above—Van himself. Frances noted down: "He's much smarter than I'll ever be. I think he's wonderful—but what does he think of me?"

left—Frances Neal as Van originally met her. She told him she was about to marry. "Don't be too sure you are going to wed that guy," Van said to her.

above—Wedding day look—"five months and a week from our first meeting."

below—Love in wartime. Van home on a furlough, Frances waiting for motherhood. She begged, "Do you suppose I dare go out to Ciro's for laughs?" Van grinned. "If we meet the Stork coming in at the front door, we'll just make it a threesome," he said proudly.

(4) He was acting in "Philadelphia Story," and I was acting in "George White's Scandals" in theaters across the street from each other—yet we never met.

But the point is: I wonder whether we'll ever meet again. He forgot to ask me for my telephone number until we were on my doorstep . . . and then he didn't write it down. He'll forget it, I know. And the worst of it is . . . I'll die if he doesn't call me.

I know now I'm really in love for the first time in my life.

April 17, 1942.

He did remember the number! He called me at nine this morning and asked me whether I'd be busy tonight. (Of course I wasn't! I'd already broken my date just in case he'd call.) Well, he came for me, and we spent an hour at the Tropics, which is so romantic anyhow, and then we started driving. We drove all the way to Malibu and back—with the top down in the pouring rain, and I didn't even notice it until I got back. He talked steadily about enlisting in the Army—as if he didn't know I was there, but he just had to talk to someone.

When we got home, Mother had a roaring fire going in the grate. We were standing in front of it, trying to get dried out when like a bolt out of the blue, he suddenly asked me to marry him.

Just like that!

I don't know how I ever found words to answer him . . . but you can imagine what I said. Here we've only really known each other two days . . . but it's right. I know it's right. Righter than anything I've ever done in my life.

I can't write any more. I can't even think!

Hysterical is the word for the past month—clothes, parties, showers, everything is in a whirlwind. And of course meeting Van's mother, who is so happy about the coming marriage. She had only one gloomy moment—when she worried about whether Van's and my dogs would get along!

Two very wonderful things happened today—Van found the ring he wanted for me, and I finally found the apartment we've both wanted for us.

And the Great Day is only three days off!

May 16, 1942.

This morning at ten o'clock we were married—exactly five months and one week from our first meeting. Van's mother, my parents, and four friends were with us at the Congregational Church down in Westwood Village, and then we left at once to drive up here to Del Monte.

We're both so intensely happy, and—though I still can't believe it—I'm Mrs. Van Heflin.

September 30, 1942.

I'm writing at my desk in our living room while Van works on the script of "Tennessee Johnson" in the striped chair five feet away from me. I've been married four and a half months. Van sits in that spot for hours, methodically going over every syllable of every word—I can see now why people consider him one of the greatest actors of all time. And looking at him, I know that these months with him have been the happiest months of my entire life. After all the running around both of us have done, we were ready to settle down when we got married, and settle down we did. We've found so much happiness here in our own home with books and records and a few good friends that we don't even want to go out.

We balance each other perfectly. Van's quiet and reserved; I'm as talkative as a parrot. He spends hours straightening out our bank accounts—and then, in two seconds, I get them all messed up. He worries and I don't . . . and the result is that we've been laughing for four months straight. It's been heavenly—and now the news I learned today is all we could possibly ask.

We are going to have a baby!

When I told Van this evening, he stood there speechless, grinning at me. Then he recovered his voice and the demonstration that followed will go down in history! If it's a girl, she'll be Vana, and if it's a boy, he's Van Jr. I've already decided that! We spent three wild hours deciding everything about him (for some reason we are both sure it will be a him). We know that our baby will have the most-in-love couple in Hollywood for parents.

The only worry I have is that Van has enlisted. He's only waiting now for his call into the Army.

November 9, 1942.

Van and I had our first quarrel, and you might even call it the Battle of the Century.

That such a thing should ever happen to Van and me!

It started just before my parents were coming over for dinner last night. I guess it was my fault—I was irritable. Anyhow, we were arguing when Mother and Dad arrived. Van shut up like a clam when the bell rang . . . and then he passed them on the doorsill on his way out, saying coldly, "Frances will tell you why I won't be here for dinner."

He didn't come home again until ten o'clock. (Later he confessed he was only at Chasen's cooling off in a hot steam bath.) Anyhow, I was in bed when he came back, and I pretended to be asleep, regardless of the terrible racket he made. This morning I got up early and dressed. He opened one eye when I put my hat on and said, "Where are you going?" I snapped, "Out!" and left.

It was the longest day I've ever spent. I was determined not to come home until evening . . . and I'll bet I walked ninety miles around the Farmer's Market, killing time until I could go home with my pride. When I got there, Van met me at the door with a telegram in his hand—his orders to be sent to San Luis Obispo. He is now a Lieutenant in the United States Army.

He's leaving tomorrow. I can't believe it. It has all happened so suddenly that I feel stunned. Why did we have that quarrel that meant missing all those hours we could have spent with each other? Time is so short now . . . and I get the most awful lump in my throat when I see Van in his uniform, even though I am prouder of him than I've ever been before.

March 4, 1943.

War months. Lonely months in which I've been a "service widow" and an expectant mother, which added together mean you don't feel too terrific at any time. That's why I've written here so little recently. But tonight's divine. Here's why. I know what my first words to our coming baby will be. "Darling," I'll say, "your father won the Academy Award!"

Neither Van nor I could believe our ears when they called his name from the speaker's stand to come up and get his Oscar. We'd both been so happy when his commanding officer gave him a few days' furlough so he could be here for the banquet . . . but we'd never dreamed he'd be up there in his uniform, getting the Award.

June 20, 1943.

It's a girl! Vanna Gay Heflin! She arrived this morning at ten-thirty a.m. and weighed nine pounds and five ounces. I had to have a Caesarian, and I do believe she was just waiting for her daddy to be here before she would make her debut into this world. I'm glad she did wait, even if her being so tardy made me a bit of trouble. I'd gone to the hospital four days previously, thinking I'd have to go through the whole thing alone. Here I'll confess I didn't like the idea. Still, I was planning to be very patriotic about it all. I told myself I was a war wife and a war mother and that I had no more right to ask for a furlough for Van than all the other girls bringing babies into this life while their husbands are away. But Vanna kept stalling, and just ten minutes before they were due to take me to the operating room, Van appeared.

It's too bad Van won't be here to be with his daughter day by day and watch her grow. But to try and make up for it during all the war years when he'll be away, I know just what I'm going to tell Vanna every day. I'll tell her that she has the wisest, kindest, most grown-up guy for a father her mother ever met

HUNCHES THEY CAN'T EXPLAIN

GEORGE BRENT, now mustered out of service and returning to pictures, believes that he owes his life to some eerie intervention to which he cannot give a name. George used to own a plane and was keen on flying it himself. A woman astrologer warned him to give up flying and mentioned a date in the future as especially bad for aviators.

Months later, when George had forgotten the prediction, he all at once had an overwhelming impulse to sell his plane. He did. The new owner took it up next day and was killed.

Afterward, Brent realized with a shock that the day of the crash was the one he'd been warned about.

PRIVATE TYRONE POWER of the U. S. Marine Corps tells this story of several years ago. He wanted to see a play in which Katharine Cornell was opening that night. Instead, he accepted an invitation to a party because he didn't have money for a theater ticket. But then, just before five o'clock, on a hunch so strong it was almost an audible command, he rushed around to the theater in the forlorn hope of wangling a pass.

To Tyrone's astonishment, the manager of the company hailed him into his office and offered him the job of understudying the leading man—a job, by the way, which led to roles that landed Ty in Hollywood. Furthermore, the manager pressed upon Ty two tickets for the opening. And the pay-off: when Ty returned to his boarding house to dress, the landlady handed him a message that had come after Ty went out in the morning. It was from the Cornell manager, asking him to drop by the office before five—tomorrow would be too late.

GRACIE ALLEN has a ghost. Gracie saw this ghost right on a busy street in New York, of all places. At home, in Cambridge, Mass., she had an aged dog named Patrick. Gracie and Patrick were devoted.

Several years later, George Burns and Gracie were leaving the Palace Theater, the first night Gracie ever played there. "And I saw my little fox terrier," Gracie tells you, "right in front of me. I called 'Patrick!' George said, 'Nobody's there, Gracie.' But I said, 'My dog! Patrick!' George stared. He said, 'There's no dog, either.' And suddenly Patrick wasn't anywhere. The next day I got a letter telling me Patrick had died."

HONEST...

by KATHERINE LAKE

BOB HOPE'S private life is centered about his charming and talented wife, Dolores Reade Hope, their two children, Linda three-and-a-half and Tony two, and their spacious home in the Toluca Lake district.

You've probably never thought of wise-cracking Bob in a paternal role, but no less an authority than Dolores says, "Bob's a wonderful father. He is crazy about the children."

Bob's darling is little Linda, an angelic small minx. In her diminutive red cord slacks and blue jacket, a tiny red beret crowning her honey-gold curls, chattering in her baby treble as she chases the cat, she ensnares Bob completely. He isn't a top-flight comedian to her. He's just Daddy, who tosses her into the air as she squeals with delight; who brings her presents when he comes home from his cross-country jaunts.

Two-year-old Tony holds a terrific place in his father's heart, too, but that's man to man. Every evening when Bob is home, thumps and thuds mingled with laughter ring through the house about eight p.m.

That clatter is Bob and Tony playing dive bomber. Bob hardly has his foot in the door before Tony, in sleepers, appears at the head of the stairs, demanding imperiously, "Daddy, le's play di' bomber. Daddy. C'mon."

Bob catches Tony in a big sweep of his arms as he tops the stairs, and the game begins. Tony is the dive bomber and his own sound effects man, zooming and roaring until he's breathless in Bob's arms.

The children are always ready for bed when Bob gets home from the studio. Properly they should be asleep, but those precious moments of play with them are not to be denied. "For an hour after they've had their play, the children scamper through the hall or want drinks of water," Dolores Hope explains. "Bob can't understand why they're in such a state of excitement. But that's the only time Bob has to play with them, so I let them stay up a bit, hoping all that happiness does them good and that they can sleep later in the morning to make it up."

However, Bob never interferes with the children's discipline. That's their mother's province, he

The Hope in repose. And if these pictures don't convince you he has a private life, just read our story. But to get back to business, be sure you see him in his "Let's Face It."

Bob Hope HAS a Private Life

says, though sometimes he is sorely tempted to use the old fashioned hairbrush himself.

One morning childish howls emanated from upstairs, and Bob rushed up, his face a kaleidoscope of surprise, chagrin, and dismay. He was far more flustered than an audience has ever seen him.

"You're wanted upstairs," he told Dolores, fuming and gesticulating. "Linda just bit Tony's finger."

"He was so mad he was sputtering, yet he felt so helpless it was funny," Dolores now tells it. "Mostly he was hurt and shocked that his angel Linda would be such a small devil."

The Hopes have been married for eleven years, and even in Hollywood it seems safe to say theirs is one marriage that will last. Dolores Hope is a devout Catholic to whom the words of the marriage ceremony, "until death do us part" mean exactly that. When they had been married eight years and had no children of their own, they adopted Linda. A year and a half later, Tony was adopted, like Linda, from the famous "Cradle." The Hope family will not stop with two children. Bob and Dolores want a family of five.

Bob and Dolores met when he visited a Broadway night club one evening. Dolores Reade was singing

Mr. and Mrs. Bob Hope. They met in a Broadway night club when she was vocalist for George Olsen's orchestra and he was the star of "Roberta."

there with George Olsen's orchestra. Bob was playing in "Roberta" at that time. A friend introduced them, and Bob invited Dolores to see his show. Dolores was amazed to discover he was the star of the show. She had thought he was a chorus boy.

Dolores left New York for an engagement in Florida, and Bob burned the wires telephoning her. She waited a whole year, surrounded by his wires, flowers, and letters, before she consented to become Mrs. Bob Hope.

Dolores is one of those rare wives who are the perfect complement for their husbands; beautiful with quiet distinction, gracious and talented and possessing a remarkable capability of her own. Bob and Dolores might easily have combined their talents and worked out an act in which both would have shared the spotlight. But Dolores did not want that.

"Bob does so much and works so hard, he needs a home completely separated from his work," his wife says. "I am sure Bob likes it better this way though he would have been the last person to make me think it was my duty to give up a career to make a home for him."

After eleven years, he's still Dolores' favorite comedian. "Bob is just naturally witty," she says. "The funniest things he says are spontaneous, and he's always popping out with them. On the set of 'Let's Face It' the other day, the make-up man handed him a mirror. Bob stuck out his tongue and viewed himself critically. 'I've seen better coats than that on Crosby,' he commented. That's the sort of thing that just bounces out of him constantly."

However, the brand of humor that makes Bob's radio public hilarious is not appreciated by his wife. "Even though I know it's just to be funny, it makes me furious," Dolores said, "when on the radio they joke about Bob's appearance. He is really handsome. They kid about his being stingy when actually he is the most generous of men. I know it's ridiculous, but when I listen to his program, I boil.

"Considering the pace at which Bob works, you'd naturally expect his home life to bear the brunt of his occasional fatigue, but honestly it doesn't. Bob is the most amiable man. He's really wonderful about that. I know he must be tired sometimes, but I could count on my fingers the times he's admitted it. The trip to Alaska, and those hundreds of trips around the country to the Army camps—he doesn't think he's doing anything. Actually, with all he's doing for the war effort, if he gets one letter from a fan criticizing him for not being in service, he's depressed for weeks. He is past the enlistment age, but he never tells that as the real explanation—which it is. He's amazing about it."

Bob's great reserve of energy is the wonder of all who know him. He does nothing to safeguard it. He loves good wholesome food of the home cooked variety. You are far more likely to run into Bob Hope in Sally's Tea Room or Mary's Coffee Shop than in the finest hotel restaurant.

Bob has a marvelous faculty for being able to separate work from play. When he works, he is completely absorbed, but when he relaxes, he can just as completely forget work. After putting in full days at the studio, Bob works all but two nights a week on the show for his weekly broadcast. After dinner on his work nights, he takes himself to his office above the garage to beat out some laughs for the public.

Another Hope wisecrack goes into somebody's book at the Hollywood Canteen.

The other two nights are for play, that is, if Bob hasn't agreed to entertain workers at a nearby defense plant, or soldiers at one of the encampments in the vicinity. Although Bob likes to have people around him, the Hopes have little time for social life these days. When they do get together with their friends, the group more often than not includes the Bing Crosbys, but their partying is done at their home or the home of friends, seldom at night clubs.

The Hope home bespeaks gracious living. The house is of English farmhouse architecture surrounded by spacious grounds, and by no stretch of the imagination can it be called a ranch. Bob is not the farmer type.

The living room is in the center of the house overlooking the garden in the rear. Deep comfortable divans and broad topped tables cluster in intimate seating groups, with gleaming copper and wood ash trays and bric-a-brac lending a warm, hospitable glow.

At one end of the room, the fireplace is flanked by cozy benches and table where Bob and Dolores indulge in gin rummy sessions. "Bob always wins," Dolores admits. "He beats me at everything."

The opposite end of the room, which leads off to the dining room, contains a small bar with high wooden stools upholstered in red leather. Here, too, is a small studio piano ready if anyone feels inclined to give with music. Altogether it is a gay room and one particularly adapted to fun.

Though Bob's unusual ability to concentrate is one of his greatest assets, it was the biggest stumbling block to the Hopes' happiness in the first years of their marriage. In those days when Dolores spoke to Bob across the room, she received no reply. When she repeated her remark, a little louder, she still met blank silence. To the young bride there was only one explanation; Bob was ignoring her. With injured pride, she froze, and Bob wouldn't know what he'd done to make her angry.

"Today, it seems a trivial thing indeed to have made a fuss about," Dolores smiles, "but in that first year of married life you're both so vulnerable. Yet, it's the most important period of adjustment for both husband and wife. If more girls had no mother to go home to every time a problem arose, more marriages would stick." Dolores still meets that silence—but now she knows it's merely Bob in a creative mood.

The Hopes do not take their happy married life for granted. Seventy-five per cent of the credit for a lasting marriage belongs to the wife, Dolores believes. It is up to the wife to stay married. Love can learn to overlook the small irritations that exist in every marriage.

"Above all, a wife should realize that her husband comes first," Dolores declares. "Yet she must keep her individuality. After all, your individuality was one of the things that made your husband admire you in the first place."

Dolores Hope maintains her individuality by serving as Southern California's A.W.V.S. chairman for Agriculture. Her group enlists and registers women for harvesting those important crops so necessary to feed the world. It is an important job in war work, but it is more than that to Dolores. It is a life-saver, for it helps to dispel her fears for Bob's safety when he is on extended trips entertaining troops. The Alaska trip, for instance, flying in all kinds of weather. Like so many wives today, she stays behind and worries. She doesn't try to discourage him from these trips in line of duty, and there will be more of them to worry about, she knows. That's Bob's public life.

But taking care of the children and keeping the home hearth aflare for Bob—that's his private life, and Dolores is the custodian of it.

LETTERS FROM OUR BOYS IN THE SERVICE . . . . . .

$10.00 LETTER

Dear Miss Waterbury:

The first thought that comes into a Marine's head when the scuttlebut gets around that any notable has joined the Corps is: he'll probably want special privileges or resent being treated as a "boot." Too often this has been the case, and the rest of us resent very much the joining of that type of man.

Therefore, we were definitely put off guard when a tall, blond, agreeable "boot" turned out to be the Hollywood star Stirling Hayden. We were inclined to be sceptical about his ability to "take it."

Needless to say, when the word got around that Hayden was not "salty," that he was bobbed and mugged as the rest of us, that he "hit the deck" pronto when told to do so by his D.I., and that he stood "at attention," referring to himself in the third person when addressed by his seniors, he was admitted into the sanctum sanctorum of Marine fellowship.

Stirling Hayden fired three targets from my rifle while here on the range, and his coach was my bunkie. I don't remember having seen him except casually when he was sitting on the benches waiting his turn to fire, and then I frankly wasn't curious about him because I had my own relays to fire, and our jobs are to teach boots the intricacies of the rifle marksmanship and not to stare at outside celebrities. His coach did say that Hayden was "expert material"—and in Marine Coach lingo, that means a lot.

I do not know what has happened to Hayden since he was graduated into a full fledged Marine, but wherever he is, I am sure he is doing his part to uphold the traditions of which the Marines are so proud.

Dear Miss Waterbury:

I disagree with Pvt. R. F. Stokes' letter in a recent issue of Movieland. He states that fellows in the service who are half disgusted will amount to nothing.

There are quite a number of us here that have been in for a period of six months and have only been allowed to town once a week. During our course at Sioux Falls Radio School we can remember having only two U.S.O. shows. Many a time we were disgusted because we weren't seeing the big shows that go to other camps.

But we had the finest equipment available, and we took advantage of it by learning all we possibly could. The radio operators of Sioux Falls are the best that go out on the line. We are in Las Vegas now studying to become gunners, and we will be lucky if we can see a show given by the U.S.O. or someone else. But we'll try our best to be good men out on the line, even though we do get discouraged at times.

Dear Miss Waterbury:

This is a plea, from the soldiers down here in this last outpost of civilization, to you in Hollywood, who are about the only ones who can find an answer to our problem.

We're stationed down here in a very small town, out in the woods, and the nearest thing to a Hollywood star is a movie or a motion picture magazine. We'd like to get to see just one star before the war is over—in person, I mean. We'd like Betty Grable, Dinah Shore, or Bette Davis, but we'd settle for Vera Vague, Brenda, and Cobina, or Cass Dailey.

We fellows here in Florida miss out on all the shows that hit around the bigger cities. We here at Homestead and Key West even fail to see the few stars who dribble in to Miami.

Maybe we are asking too much, but would you print our plight in Movieland, and maybe some one will take pity on us and drop in on us with a star in tow.

Staff Sergeant Jay Wrinkle
427th Air Base Squadron
Homestead Field, Florida

You Waves, Waacs, and Marines—why don't you write us, too? We know you've seen camp shows and Hollywood personalities. Tell us about them. For the best letters we give five and ten dollars.

It's getting to be a thing between Ginny Simms and Pat Nearney, the Hollywood socialite sailor. It used to be a thing with Pat and Anne Shirley and before that, it was very intense between Pat and Martha Kemp Mature, Vic Mature's ex. WORDS OF MUSIC

A few years back, when Frank Sinatra was the vocalist with Harry James' band, he made a record of "All Or Nothing At All," and the label read "Harry James and his Orchestra with vocal refrain by Frank Sinatra." Much has happened since then to both Frank and Harry, and recently, when Sinatra hit the top, Columbia Records decided to reissue that old disc. But here's the amusing thing: The label this time will read, "Frank Sinatra singing 'All Or Nothing At All' accompanied by Harry James and his Orchestra." And this is with Harry's sanction and approval. Nice guy, Harry.

Of interest to old Casa Loma fans is the news that Pee-Wee Hunt, jump vocalist and trombonist with the band ever since it was organized, has retired from the profession and gone into advertising work.

Peggy Lee, Benny Goodman's very popular vocalist, has also retired, but for a different reason. She and her husband, Dave Barbour, ex-guitarist with the band, will welcome a "new arrangement" in a few months. While in Hollywood, Benny auditioned several well-known singers to replace Peggy. But there was a hot rumor afloat that Helen Ward would join him in New York when he opened the Astor Roof late in June. Helen, of course, was Benny's sensational vocalist several years ago when he was just beginning to climb the ladder. She has recently come back into the music business and has been working with Hal McIntyre's band in the East. Helen's records are still played wherever there are juke boxes; and she is considered by many critics to be the greatest all-time girl band singer. At his Palladium opening out here last month, Woody Herman prevailed upon Benny Goodman and Buddy Rich (Buddy was on leave from the Marine Base) to come up to the stand and jam a bit. The "bit" turned out to be about twenty choruses of "The Blues," and pretty soon the place was rocking.

Well, kiddies, there it is. You like?

I hope so. And if you want me to answer any questions on your musical favorites, either real or on platters, just drop me a line.

The Goodman spreads a little jam at his pal, Wood Herman's opening at the Palladium.

JILL WARREN, "WORDS OF MUSIC" EDITOR, SAYS:

I WAS born in Los Angeles on a July 4, and things have been popping ever since. All through grammar school and high school I found myself mixed up in kiddie revues, dramatic societies, and dancing classes. I decided I should also try my hand at writing. So being enrolled in the journalism class anyway, I started a column in the school paper.

I graduated from Los Angeles High School and carried on for two years at Cumnock School For Girls, whereupon I went to work at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios as a secretary.

After two years at Metro, I went over the hill to Twentieth Century-Fox, still as a secretary. While working for one of the directors on the lot, I talked myself into a part in "Over My Dead Body." My performance was so gruesome that they cast me in another horror called "Quiet Please, Murder."

My next acting assignment, taking me from the ridiculous to the ridiculous, was that of Oliver Hardy's dancing partner in his new film, "Dancing Masters." In the interim, I have found time to sing with several dance bands around Hollywood. And of course there is my every Wednesday night session at the Hollywood Canteen.

He's already been called up, but was deferred until late summer. Unfortunately, Sol Lesser, who has him under contract, has no role ready for him in this interval. Lon hopes he'll get back to make good on this first lucky break.

ATLAS of WORLD WAR II

AMONG the various war activities stars are now sponsoring, Myrna Loy, who is definitely coming back to the screen in the next "Thin Man" picture at MGM, has added a new one. Taking, perhaps, a cue from Wendell Willkie, who is giving all the profits of his book "One World" to China Relief, Myrna is sponsoring the sale of "Atlas of World War II" for the benefit of Greek War Relief. For only a dollar, the book contains dramatically captioned, up to the last headline war maps. It's a grand book, and besides every copy sold aids that gallant little nation that, absolutely overwhelmed, still managed to hold out against the Axis for six fearful months.

If you want a copy, simply address the Greek War Relief, New York City. The postman will collect one dollar plus postage. when he delivers it to you.

the newest, prettiest girl in town. He has been doing this ever since the silent days when Billie Dove was the beauty of his attentions. Of all the three score and ten girls of his dates, not one has ever succeeded in holding his interest for very long. Even such stars as Katharine Hepburn and Ginger Rogers thought to marry him. They didn't. Lana Turner is the only girl absolutely known to have done the walking out on him.

Here's hoping that Ava doesn't get hurt.

SAMPLE OF SITUATIONS ON SETS

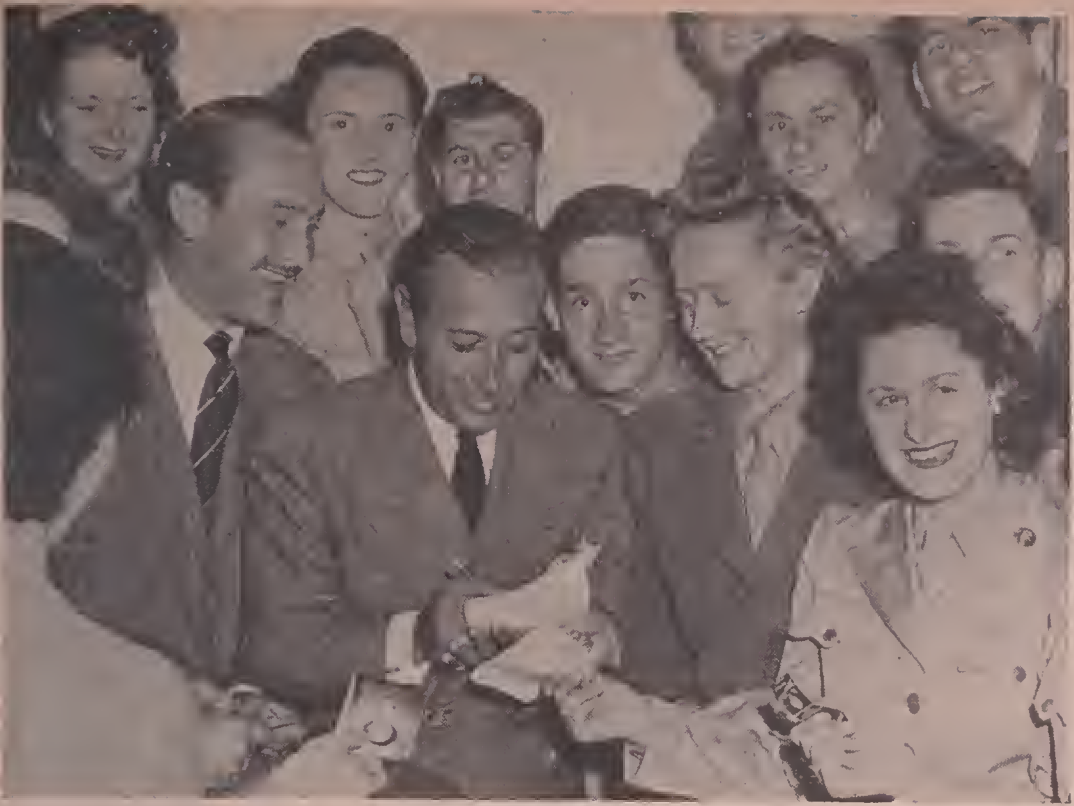
I dropped in on the "Cry Havoc" set on the afternoon that Bob Sterling's leave was up, and he was heading back to Thunderbird Field. Ann Sothern's eyes were big saucers of loneliness.

I'll give you long odds on this marriage lasting. Ann respects the institution of marriage, and was miserable when her alliance with Roger Pryor broke up. She thought over this present marriage long and soberly before she entered into it. Bob Sterling, incidentally, is the most in-love young man I've seen in years. He's a sweet kid who deserves a girl like Annie.

MERCHANT MARINER EMBARRASSES WILDE

Like all people working in Hollywood, I am continually being asked to take some service man around with me when I go calling on players. Recently a friend asked me to take a young ensign in the Merchant Marine. He was sailing that night. If he had the faintest idea of where he was going or when he was returning, he certainly wasn't telling anyone.

Left—The Errol Flynn-Nora Eddington dating has reached that hand-holding very protective stage. And right—Red Skelton, at long last, seems to be getting over his torch-bearing for his former wife. His favorite girl now is pretty Muriel Morris, dancing with him here.



At Fort MacArthur, George Raft and Lee Bowman sign autographs for WAACS. This is the first time the stars have gone out to entertain the gal fighters—and the girls asked only for male stars!

I was headed out to Twentieth Century-Fox that day, so I took the ensign along. We stopped first on the "Wintertime" set because my naval friend wanted to meet Sonja Henie. We waited and waited, but Sonja was dressing. Meanwhile we talked to Cornel Wilde.

I told Cornel about the lad in uniform, his "target" for that evening. Cornel turned white, and I cursed myself for being stupid. For there, of course, he was, in make-up, before that man in blues. I only put this story in to show that fathers face the same problem here in Hollywood that they face everywhere else. Cornel is very much in love with his pretty wife, and he absolutely adores his baby who was born late last spring. He is just getting started in the movie business and isn't yet far enough along to be in that "big money." To go now means giving up all the things that are dear to him. Yet he does want to go.

REMARK FROM OAKIE

Jack Oakie, working in "Wintertime," bounced over when he saw us.

"How long should it take to make a picture like this?" asked the Ensign.

"It should take about three days," cracked Jack, "but I have a six weeks' guarantee, so it will take six weeks, my friend, even seven."

SLATED FOR STARDOM

We topped off our trip by going over to the "Song of Bernadette" set. It was a weird and wonderful sensation. We had walked off the sound stage onto the back lot, away from Twentieth Century into the nineteenth.

The scene was the garbage dump where Bernadette first sees the Vision, the same garbage dump that later becomes the Shrine of Lourdes. Before it, in front of the cameras, flowed a very real and very cold brook into which some fake stepping stones had been placed.

Jennifer Jones, as Bernadette, stood before the shrine, seeing the Vision. We sat ourselves down beside Director Henry King.

He's a handsome and kindly gentleman, this Henry King, and he has been directing stars ever since the days that Lillian Gish, with an unknown leading man named Ronald Colman, made "Romola." (There was a fairly unknown villain in that one, too, named William Powell.)

It was a hard scene to manage. The fire had to be just so, and since it was out-of-doors, the fire rather wanted to burn in its own way. The brook had to be just so, too. Again and again, solely because of the fire and the brook, Jennifer Jones had to see the Vision, turn, and run barefooted into that icy water, and not grimace, as supposedly she does not feel its coldness. (Actually she was practically blue with the cold.)

She is a tall, thin girl, this Jennifer Jones, not beautiful in the glamour sense, but compelling looking.

I said to Henry King, "How is she?"

He looked at me. "She is absolutely the finest actress I've ever directed," he said.

Which is really something, coming from one who has directed practically every top star in the business.

ONE STAR MISSING

As we were driving back to Hollywood, the Ensign sighed. "It was all perfect except that I didn't meet Shirley Temple."

Right there, I think, is the reason that David Selznick, over and above her youth and beauty, signed Shirley. She is fifteen now, with twelve years of acting experience behind her and a public that has grown up from childhood to youth right along with her, waiting to see her again.

Selznick has done such a magnificent job with Bergman, Fontaine, and Jennifer Jones that all Hollywood is sitting back to see if he can manage, not Shirley, but her Mama. Mama used to want to do all the dictating on what Shirley should play and how.

The bets are on Selznick to win.

THERE WILL BE NO PLACE BETS

All movieland is watching the outcome of the Bubbles Schinasi-Arthur Hornblow romance. Bubbles, you will remember, is the ex-wife of ex-actor-now-naval lieutenant Wayne

Morris, and Hornblow is the ex-of-Myrna Loy, now Mrs. John Hertz. This is a romance of about a year's standing and has apparently nothing to stand in its way. However, there is a great stumbling block, Bubbles' mama, Ruby Schinasi, who doesn't approve of the match and arrived in California just the other day.

Bubbles had been living out in movieland for the past few months and had been seen out with Hornblow constantly. Since mama arrived, Bubbles is seen constantly in the company of her mother, and Mr. Hornblow can get his dates as they fall. Odds are even that a marriage will take place and that it won't.

MOVIELAND SALUTES JOAN BLONDELL

The other evening this editor was tending the phone at the Hollywood Canteen. A voice came over the wire identifying herself as Joan Blondell. She asked whether there were any movie stars down there that night and whether she was needed.

As it happened there were seven hundred boys in the Canteen and not one real live movie star. When she was informed of this, Miss Blondell did herself up real movie-star like and came down to the Canteen, served coffee, signed autographs, danced with the boys, and just sat and talked.

She arrived at eight in the evening and didn't leave until the doors were closed at twelve that night. To top the whole thing Joan had just returned from a camp trip throughout the southern part of the United States. Before that she had taken a trip up in Newfoundland to entertain. It didn't matter to Joan that she was tired and needed rest, she just knew those boys needed entertaining, and down she came.

A BIT INVOLVED, BUT FUN

Irene, Metro's super dress designer, is married to Elliot Gibbons, who is a cousin of Mrs. Gary Cooper.. Elliot is now seeing service in the Ferry Command in Africa.

Irene is working very hard at MGM, but just couldn't resist buying the most beautiful and lovable Irish Setter you ever saw. Suddenly, what with servant shortage, Irene was faced with the problem of exercising her dog.. As she lives near the U.C.L.A. campus, she advertised in the college paper for some young man who would like to earn money after school by taking Michael, the dog, for a walk.

Well, Gary Cooper is now walking Irene's dog, and it isn't the actor. That is the boy's name, and everyone thinks it is very funny.

A TRIBUTE TO THE MICK

Mickey Rooney is in the enviable spot of being box-office champ number one. He is one of the largest money earners in the picture business. Mickey has the world by the tail. That is the Mickey whom the public knows, the fresh kid from just around the corner who gets into scrapes.

The real Mickey is the heartbroken boy whose marriage didn't work out. Half of it may have been his fault, half of it wasn't. There was no more sincere or happier person than Mickey when he married Ava Gardner.

However, Ava wanted to be Mrs. Mickey Rooney and a movie actress, too. The two didn't jell.

Like any normal American of twenty-two Mickey wanted to go into the army and defend his country. His studio made a test case of him and asked for a deferment for him so he could continue his acting and entertain. His draft board finally settled the question and declared him unfit for service.

Through all this embarrassment have you heard any word from Mickey? Not one. Just remember with all his fame and money that Mickey has taken it on the chin as few people could. Mickey represents the finest type of American manhood. He is doing what he can to help win the war in his own way, and doing it with a broken heart.

IT HAPPENS IN MOVIELAND, TOO

Pretty Anne Shirley, who is getting smarter looking every day, and agent Henry Wilson were in Ciro's, dining and dancing.

Into the room came June Havoc and Anne's ex, John Payne, now in service. The couples coldly nodded, and took seats in the opposite ends of the room.

There is more than meets the eye to the Havoc-Payne romance. It has been steadily and quietly going on, and June is a pretty fascinating girl.

SUSAN GETS ADVICE

Cute little Susan Peters is engaged to actor Richard Quine. She used to be engaged to Joan Crawford's husband, Phil Terry. Inside story of her present engagement is wonderful and shows why Susan will become a star and hold her place on the screen.

Reason: Agent Levis Green scouting for talent, found not too pretty, or too thin, or too well groomed, and very young Susan Carnahan. He signed her to a contract with his agency and started out to find her a job in a studio. He finally placed her under contract to Warner Brothers, where she played small parts and made test after test with new contractees.

Green not only handled her business affairs, but taught her how to prepare to be a star. He made her take dancing, singing, voice, diction, and coaching lessons. He made her live on her small salary and still save a part of it. He made her buy few clothes, but good ones. He had her go out with the right people, but be in every night at twelve. Between Green's and her mother's training emerged Susan Peters.

Finally Green got Susan a juicy contract at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Now is the time, according to usual Hollywood custom, for Susan to change her agent and start on the glamour road. Not so. Green is in the army, but he still receives his ten percent for handling her. She writes him twice a week about her progress and comings and goings, and when she became engaged, she wrote and asked him whether it was all right.

Susan says that only through the intelligent handling and bolstering of her morale, when things looked tough, did she ever get to be a movie star, and she doesn't care to make any decision of any magnitude unless she can consult the man who was instrumental in her great success.

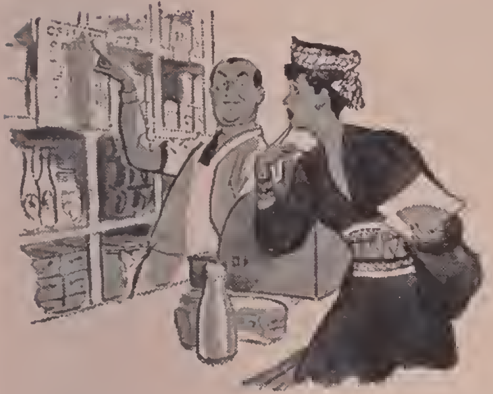
7 things you should do to keep prices down!

If prices soar, this war will last longer, and we could all go broke when it's over. Uncle Sam is fighting hard to keep prices down. But he can't do it alone. It's up to you to battle against any and every rising price! To help win the war and keep it from being a hollow victory afterward—you must keep prices down. And here's how you can do it:

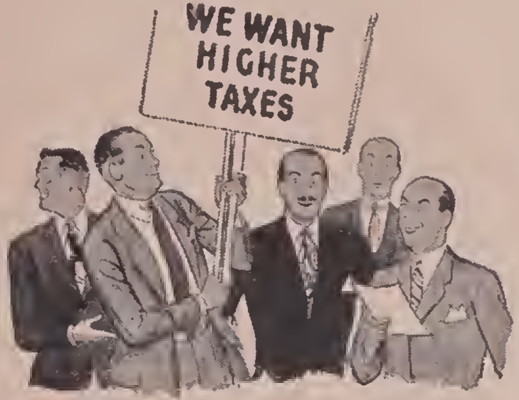
1. BUY ONLY WHAT YOU NEED

Don't buy a thing unless you cannot get along without it. Spending can't create more goods. It makes them scarce and prices go up. So make everything you own last longer. "Use it up, wear it out, make it do, or do without."



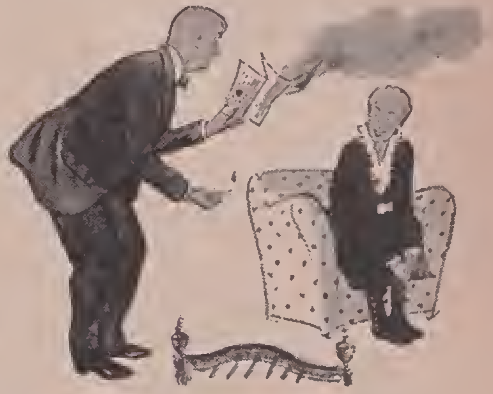
2. PAY NO MORE THAN CEILING PRICES

If you do pay more, you're party to a black market that boosts prices. And if prices go up through the ceiling, your money will be worth less. Buy rationed goods only with stamps.



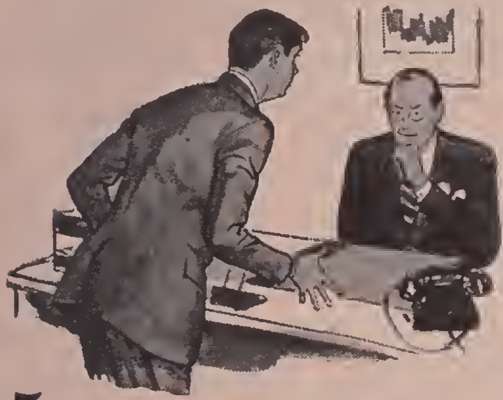
3. SUPPORT HIGHER TAXES

It's easier and cheaper to pay for the war as you go. And it's better to pay big taxes now—while you have the extra money to do it. Every dollar put into taxes means a dollar less to bid for scarce goods and boost prices.



4. PAY OFF OLD DEBTS

Paid-off debts make you independent now . . . and make your position a whale of a lot safer against the day you may be earning less. So pay off every cent you owe—and avoid making new debts as you'd avoid heiling Hitler!

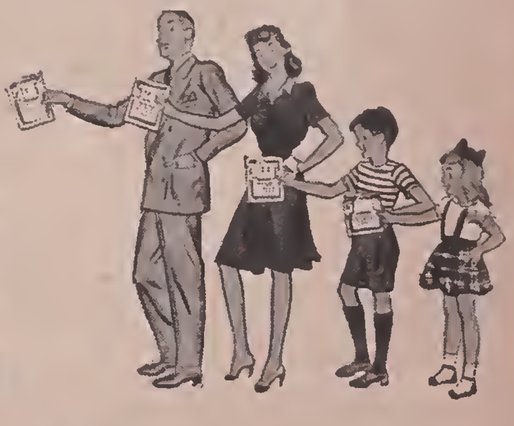


5. DON'T ASK MORE MONEY

in wages, or in prices for goods you have to sell. That puts prices up for the things all of us buy. We're all in this war together—business men, farmers and workers. Increases come out of everybody's pocket—including yours.

6. SAVE FOR THE FUTURE

Money in the savings bank will come in handy for emergencies. And money in life insurance protects your family, protects you in old age. See that you're ready to meet any situation.



7. BUY WAR BONDS

and hold them. Buy as many as you can. Then cut corners to buy more. Bonds put money to work fighting the war instead of letting it shove up prices. They mean safety for you tomorrow. And they'll help keep prices down today.

KEEP PRICES DOWN . . .

Use it up . . . Wear it out . . .

Make it do . . . Or do without.

The METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

We think that the best story the late Eric Knight ever wrote is "Lassie Come Home." We liked his "This Above All" but when it comes to "Lassie" we liked this above all.

★ ★ ★ ★

So much for the wonderful book—now for the wonderful picture. It is called "Lassie Come Home."

★ ★ ★ ★

We predict that the whole country will go to the dog when they hear the word-of-mouth praise from those who have seen "Lassie."

★ ★ ★ ★

Yes indeed, "Lassie" is a human thing. It takes a sudden dive to the bottom of your heart and stirs up the waves of compassion and understanding.

It is a picture of suspense—as exciting as any thriller you've been thrilled by and more artistically told.

★ ★ ★ ★

Out at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio they're handing bouquets to young Fred Wilcox who turned in this first feature directorial assignment.

★ ★ ★ ★

Rarely has there been a better cast in a motion picture. To name a few—Roddy McDowall, Donald Crisp, Dame May Whitty, Edmund Gwenn, Nigel Bruce, Elsa Lanchester. Sort of makes you think of the cast of "How Green Was My Valley," doesn't it?

★ ★ ★ ★

Hugo Butler, who wrote the screen play from the Eric Knight "best-seller," pulled his copy out of the top drawer. And Samuel Marx produced "Lassie" with loving care.

★ ★ ★ ★

As the broad beautiful scenes in Technicolor unfold, we do more than admire. We find ourselves in the grip of a characterful drama that will be played in theatres over and over again.

★ ★ ★ ★

Inquire of your favorite theatre when "Lassie Come Home" will be played. If you are a father, bring your wife and kids. If you are a mother, bring your husband and kids. If you are a kid, take the lazy grown-ups in hand.

★ ★ ★ ★

Go out of the house to see "Lassie Come Home."

★ ★ ★ ★

We're just a lion who's putting on the dog.

Just a boy and his dog . . .

From the pages of Eric Knight's great best-seller (he wrote "This Above All" too, remember?) comes a great drama. No roar of guns, no bombs, no tanks, no planes here . . . but emotion deep, human and intense in a story you'll live and love. The kind of story real people like to pass along to their friends.

CAPTAIN CLARK GABLE AFTER THE WAR

From the most authentic source, to Movieland exclusively, comes some pretty distressing news for Gable fans.

It's this, and it's true. You won't be seeing Clark on the screen again, not during the war nor after the war.

The big fellow, whom everyone in Hollywood worshipped, feels he has found his destiny in the Army. He likes being Captain Gable. He wants to keep on being Captain Gable, even after peace is declared. He says that he will never return to the screen. Naturally, if our government asks him to make propaganda shorts or even feature films, he will do that, though he would prefer not to. But as for regular acting in make-believe stories, that he refuses.

Don't cheer yourself up with the idea that Clark may change his mind. I hope he does, but I'll wager anything that he won't. Gable is not a mind-changer. There's a stubborn streak in him which he inherits from his Dutch ancestors, and when he gets an idea, he sticks to it regardless of arguments. He said after Carole's death that he would never make another picture. He did finish "Somewhere I'll Find You," which was already in production, but he did that rather than let down MGM, his one and only producing company.

Clark really loves every minute of his time in the Air Corps. He has always been a man's man, preferring male society to feminine five to one. He finds England, where he is now stationed, completely fascinating.

He's keeping his ranch in Encino, California, and will live there after the war. He'll never have to think about money again. His salary before he enlisted, had reached $75,000 a year on a flat fifty-two weeks yearly.

The only hope we see for his public is to get Selznick to release "Gone With The Wind" for a yearly revival.

Meanwhile, Movieland salutes Captain Gable, an intelligent and clever and truly patriotic great guy.

Intimate Facts Every Woman Has a Right to Know!

Improved New Feminine Hygiene Way gives continuous action for hours!

- Are you risking happiness, even health, because you don't really understand this vital problem? Don't do it! You have a right to know the truth about what modern feminine hygiene can do for you!

You may think you do know, but many women who think that still have only half-knowledge. So they rely on weak, ineffective home-made mixtures. Or worse, they risk using over-strong solutions of acids which can easily burn and injure delicate tissues.

Today, well-informed women everywhere rely on Zonitors, the new safe convenient feminine hygiene way!

Zonitors are dainty, snow-white suppositories! Non-greasy. They spread a protective coating and kill germs instantly at contact. Deodorize, by actually destroying odor, instead of temporarily "masking" it. Give continuous action for hours!

BET ON "THE BELL"

Buddy de Sylva, the production head of Paramount, has a terrific bet on with David Selznick, that "For Whom the Bell Tolls," which Paramount made with Selznick's star, Ingrid Bergman, will outgross "Gone With The Wind," which Selznick made with Clark Gable and Vivien Leigh.

"Gone With The Wind" has made almost twenty million dollars so far, being the most successful picture ever produced. Thus de Sylva is betting that "the Bell" will earn more than that unbelievable sum.

De Sylva is a very smart showman and has done a fantastically fine job of turning Paramount productions into vast money makers in the two short years he has been there. Nevertheless, I string along with Selznick on this bet.

Here's why: Great as is "For Whom the Bell Tolls," its story is not centered on the love story of its two stars. It is really the story of a small group of Spanish people, engaged in a civil war against other Spanish people.

"Gone With The Wind" may have been laid against the background of our own civil war, but it was entirely and always the story of the love and conflict between Rhett Butler and Scarlett O'Hara. I can be so wrong, but I'll wager, anytime, that this kind of story will beat the other kind of story in sheer pulling power.

What do you think? I'd be fascinated to know.

AN OFFICER AT HOLLYWOOD CANTEEN

One of the most avid entertainers of the soldiers is cute little Jane Wyman.

Just the other night she turned up at the Hollywood Canteen to sing with the band that was playing there that night. She was accompanied by her handsome and smiling Lieutenant husband, Ronald Reagan. Commissioned officers are not allowed in the Canteen. So Lt. Reagan had to spend his time in the kitchen with the ladies washing dishes.

Finally he was called out just to say hello to the boys. Stepping up on the bandstand and not knowing how the boys would take him, Ronnie grinned and said, "I don't know what they feed you boys in here, but it must be good. I have never seen so many faces smiling at an officer before."

The boys broke out in a cheer.

BACKGROUND TO DANGER (Warner Bros.)

The main attribute of this is the magnificent acting of its cast. Co-starring such chillers as George Raft and Sydney Greenstreet, with Brenda Marshall, Osa Massen and Peter Lorre, the excitement runs high. Plenty of action, suspense.

The plot is a most complicated one, involving international shenanigans going on in very international Turkey. George Raft is the hero, but that's all you do know until the end of the picture, during which you are kept wondering just who is friend and who is foe. It's the old cops-and-robbers theme, pretty well disguised by present-day Nazis, Russians, Americans, Turks, Englishmen and then some. Mr. Raft is continually climbing over walls, hiding in dark corners.

HIT THE ICE (Universal)

Abbott and Costello are hilariously back again. "Hit the Ice" is one of their funniest, happiest pictures, loaded with gags that are howls throughout.

In this one, Bud and Lou are making a bare living as sidewalk candid camera photographers. Three gangsters who are planning to rob a bank hear the boys talking about "shooting" and hire them to cover the robbery. Instead, Bud and Lou get a picture of the thugs as they come out of the bank, and realizing their mistake, the gangsters plot to get the negative and liquidate the zanies. This involves a visit to Sun Valley and a ski chase that's a riot.

Ginny Simms adds to the film with her singing, and Patric Knowles and Elyse Knox provide the love interest.

HEAVEN CAN WAIT

Here is a larksome idea: an elderly gentleman arrives in the nether world to gain admission to the Devil's group. His Satanic Majesty insists that he must know if the gentleman is wicked enough. So the old gentleman dives back into his past to prove he's a rip.

If you're drama-wise, however, you know perfectly well that he proves himself nothing of the sort. If you're story-wise and realize that Don Ameche plays the lead, you know he is about as wicked as Santa Claus. Gene Tierney as the girl he most loves and the only one he marries is charming and real.

You will get pleasant chuckles. But what was intended to be quite naughty turns out to be as heady as a tall glass of ice-cold milk.

WORDS of MUSIC

By JILL WARREN

From Bach to Boogey Woogey . . . and Jose Iturbi, noted conductor and pianist, finds out it's really fun, especially with Judy Garland to see that he keeps on the beam.

HI, PUBLIC, here I am back again. Things are really torrid in the Hollywood music works this month.

THE TUNEFILMS:

The new crop of Hollywood musicals is one of the sharpest shooting in a long time.

Warner Brothers hit the jackpot with "Thank Your Lucky Stars." The picture has every big name on the Warner lot giving out with song, including Bette Davis, Errol Flynn, Dennis Morgan, Joan Leslie, Olivia de Havilland, Ida Lupino, Ann Sheridan and Jack Carson. Of course Dinah Shore carries the biggest load, singing the title song, "Thank Your Lucky Stars," and "How Sweet You Are," both of which she introduced on her air show. She does another number called "The Dreamer" which is particularly suited to her mellow contralto. Dennis Morgan sings a clever tune called "Goodnight, Good Neighbor," which should help the Good Will policy with our friends below the border. When all this gets to your theater I wouldn't be knowing, since Warners themselves aren't sure when they will give us all a look-see, but it should be along about the time you're reading this, and anyhow, it's worth watching for . . .

Over Culver City way, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer has been making some top-flight musicals. In "Best Foot Forward," Harry James comes through with heretofore unknown terpsichorean talent and does some fancy stepping with Nancy Walker. Of course his trumpet and band are very much in evidence, too. And young Tommy Dix, from the original New York cast of the musical comedy, is nothing short of sensational. He's the original "little boy with the big voice." Only seventeen years old, but he sings the rousing "Buckle Down, Winsocki" like a veteran. Incidentally, they previewed "Best Foot Forward" ten miles out of Hollywood just a week before Betty married Harry, the James, and if you'd ever seen the screen's top glamour girl getting herself into a car pool to get to see that preview, you would have known it was love, all right.

"As Thousands Cheer" finds such rhythmic personalities as Gene Kelly, Kathryn Grayson, Lena Horne, Judy Garland, and the brilliant pianist, Jose Iturbi. But the surprise high spot of the picture is the "Boogie Woogie Goes to Carnegie Hall" number, which Judy sings, with Iturbi, no less, accompanying her on the piano—but in boogie beat. John Conte, the popular singing master of ceremonies on the Maxwell House radio show, does his first non-singing role in this one, a very amusing skit with Frank Morgan. In "Meet the People," we'll meet such musical people as Vaughn Monroe and his band, the King Sisters, and Spike Jones and his City Slickers. Vaughn's band has jumped high in popularity this past year, and besides playing a band leader, he has a dramatic part. They've glamoured Vaughn up, via the make-up department, with the idea of maybe making him a straight leading man if he goes across in this first bow.

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC?

Disc delving this month is fun because there are so many goodies on hand. Dick Haymes, former Tommy Dorsey vocalist, has made four sides for Decca which are unusual, to say the least. He has no orchestral accompaniment at all, and instead, is backed up by a choral group of mixed voices called "The Song Spinners." The tunes are "You'll Never Know," "Wait For Me, Mary," "It Can't Be Wrong" and "In My Arms," all ranking favorites on the Hit Parade . . . Columbia gives us a Harry James platter that is sure to be a best seller. Helen Forrest is her usual wonderful self on "I Heard You Cried Last Night," written by Ted Grouya, who wrote "Flamingo" and on the other side is a solid thing called "James Session" . . . Capitol Records have three swell new issues. First on the list is Billy Butterfield's band with "My Ideal" and "Without Love." Margaret Whiting does the vocals, and good, too. Margaret's father, the late composer Richard Whiting, wrote "My Ideal." Billy is the fine trumpet player who gained fame with Artie Shaw. Then we have the "Six Hits and a Miss" with Gordon Jenkins' orchestra on "Bye, Bye, Blackbird" and "Two on a Bike." And last, but not least, is a record which may prove to be a sleeper. It's Ceelle Burke, a talented Negro guitarist and vocalist, with his "Three Shades and Four Dreamers," with "Lovely Hannah" and "From Twilight Till Dawn" . . .

EARMARKS OF HITS:

"Sunday, Monday or Always" from the score of Bing Crosby's new picture "Dixie," is a cinch for a long run on the Hit Parade . . . There are no two ways about the fact that "There's No Two Ways About Love" is going to be a hit. It's a torch ballad written by Ted Koehler for Lena Horne to sing in Twentieth Century-Fox's all-colored musical, "Stormy Weather." Pinky Tomlin wrote a cute thing for the same picture, "My, My, Ain't That Somethin'" . . . Jimmy McHugh, who always has a top tune going strong, is the composer of "Let's Get Lost" which is still being found everywhere. Many of the big bands have been reviving one of Jimmy's early successes, "On the Sunny Side of the Street," and it's featured in Republic's "Dancing Debs," starring Mary Lee . . . "You Rhyme With Everything That's Beautiful" is another new tune that's very listenable. It sounds as if it were specially written for Frank Sinatra—just his type of song . . . "People Will Say

"What do you think I am?" swings June Allyson to Kenny Bowers in MGM's "Best Foot Forward."

Eddie Miller—the fellow who, Paul Whiteman says, is All-American on the tenor sax.

The DISCOVERY of the MONTH

She is neither young nor beautiful, two things that the screen is supposed to demand. She proves both qualities are quite unnecessary if a woman can act. The Paxinou can.

Her personal history is almost as great as her talent. She and her husband, Alexis Minotis, were the greatest stars of the modern Greek theatre before the Nazi hordes conquered the valiant little land.

They escaped the Nazis three times in their own country. They were torpedoed in the North Atlantic, crossing to London. In London the blitz destroyed the house in which they were living, destroying what few possessions they had left. Dauntlessly, they headed toward America in April 1942. Paxinou had one dreary experience on Broadway, then headed for Hollywood, where she tested for Pilar. Alexis Minotis has turned to writing, having already made the Saturday Evening Post and other publications.

Paxinou has already completed one other picture, "Hostages." They say she magnificently steals that picture, too.

ROMANCE in the GRAND MANNER

By FREDDA DUDLEY

THIRTEEN has always been the lucky number of Jean Pierre Aumont. His passport to America, when he was escaping fallen France, was issued on the thirteenth of the month; the play with Katharine Cornell which gave him his Broadway break and his break in this country, opened on the thirteenth; he started his most important American picture, "The Cross of Lorraine," on the thirteenth. When he and Maria Montez applied for their marriage license, inescapable statistics revealed that he was 31 (the number in reverse, and wouldn't numerologists have fun with that one). Maria was 23—such a lovely age that it doesn't need necromancy to needle it.

And so Jean Pierre and Maria were married on July 13 to take full advantage of the calendar, the zodiac, and . . . of course . . . Cupid.

The ceremony was performed by Mr. Cecil P. Holland, the same Justice of the Peace who married Hedy Lamarr and John Loder. But right there the resemblance to any other recent romance stopped. This was no rushed affair like the Lamarr-Loder nuptials, nor even the Grable-Harry James marriage of two weeks before. This was a romance with marriage done in a fine, high style as befits two people whose every gesture is colorful. A double ring service was used in which plain gold bands were exchanged. That debonnaire screen lover, Charles Boyer, was the best man (settle

1 Here's the bride next to the groom —Maria Montez and Pierre Aumont.

2 And here's where kissing starts. Pierre kisses Maria, and Maria kisses Pierre.

3 Then Lt. Ronnie Reagan rushes up to kiss Maria. Or was he first after Pierre?

4 Of course the couple give their attendants some honors. Best man Charles Boyer kisses Maria, and maid-of-honor Jeannine Crispin tip-toes to let Pierre plant one on her cheek.

5 With a grip on Maria's hand and an eye on the camera, agent Louis (Doc) Shurr bestows kiss and blessing.

6 Simone Simon gets in on the kissing.

7 And because she caught the bride's bouquet, actress Elizabeth Russell (Roz Russell's sister-in-law) gets a kiss from Maria.

8 The men do it, too, only maybe it's more of an embrace. Anyway, Nadia Petrova (Mrs. Reginald Gardiner) and Maria watch their husbands at it.

down, Aumont fans . . . it's just a term), and little Jeannine Crispin, a very romantic French girl, was maid of honor.

Maria, her eyes as richly brown as maple leaves in October, wore white satin. Over her head she wore an antique lace mantilla, and her only display of jewelry was the gold bracelet Pierre had given her.

Did she wear something old, something new, something borrowed, and something blue? Ah yes in the finest of bridal tradition. The "something old" was her pair of white satin wedding slippers, and the very gown itself. This was a white Chanel number Maria had bought some time before and loved. Being wartime, she felt it her duty not to plunge into extravagance, even for the greatest event in her vivid life. Montez is always original, and never was she more wonderfully and rightly original than in this daring, patriotic gesture. The "something borrowed" was the matched set of combs that she borrowed to hold her mantilla in place, from her maid of honor, and the "something blue" was the wide satin ribbon caught about her bouquet of white roses and bovardia.

After the ceremony and the many toasts, Maria set out to assemble all the unmarried girls to act as collective short stop for her hurled wedding bouquet. She circled the rooms and returned with a happy comment, "Practically everyone is married! Isn't it wonderful?"

Elizabeth Russell caught the bouquet, so we'll keep track of her for you. A wonderful and weird note on this beauty is that she plays the ghost in "The Uninvited"!

But really, we must tell the beginning of this romance, to the first dance, the first serious glance, the first quickening heart beat ... .

Start with a dolly shot. Which is to say . . . in Hollywood parlance . . . let the camera travel on its cat-feet rubber tires, down an aisle in the Beverly Hills Brown Derby. The camera frame will take in a teeming panorama of customers and flying waitresses, and finally will come to rest on a couple in a rear booth. A couple looking passionately into one another's eyes and talking raptly into one another's beautiful (Continued on page 68)

THE STORY OF Lana Turner's baby

Patriotism and a very true love between two young people blend into life's greatest miracle

BY DOROTHY MANNERS

EVEN with the birth of her baby Lana Turner wasn't "let off anything." Lana never is.

As this is written, the seven pound baby daughter born to Lana and Steve Crane, the famous annulment - remarriage baby, has been given its second blood transfusion within twenty-four hours after birth. The doctors say the baby is suffering from an anemic condition rare in infants. They say Lana's condition is excellent except for the mental strain.

The first thing she said to Steve when she heard her daughter had been removed to the Children's Hospital for the special transfusions, was: "She is going to be all right. I know it. We wanted her so much. I know she will fight to hold on." Steve, who had been pacing the corridor all through the hot July night, couldn't say anything except the volumes that were spoken in the gesture of pressing his weary face against his wife's hand.

They called her Cheryl Christina Crane for no reason at all except that they thought Cheryl is a beautiful name. It isn't in honor of Lana's mother or of Steve's or for any distant relative on either side.

They had talked about names a lot in those precious two months after they recaptured their happiness. If it was a boy, Lana wanted to name it Stephen. "It doesn't matter if a boy is named after someone," she said, "because men always carve lives of their own. But if it is a girl I want her to have an individual name—a beautiful name that just fits her and no one else."

After their marriage and well before baby's arrival, Lana and Stephen Crane were snapped this way at the Mocambo by Movieland's Nat Dallinger.

The idea of individuality for women is something Lana has always felt deeply. Even when she was just a kid starting out on the MGM lot, she felt it. One of her best friends was Otto Winkler, the lovable press agent who crashed to his death in that flaming plane with Carole Lombard. They used to have long talks together and once, soon after Artie Shaw had made his oft-quoted comment that Lana would have been a lot happier if she had just married some ordinary guy and settled down to raising a lot of children, she said to Otto:

"I don't suppose he meant to be flattering. But he is right about one thing—the children. I love them. I hope I have a lot of them. But he is wrong if he thinks I would have been happy without a life of my own.

"I'm glad I have been out in the world and had the opportunity to live my own life. I am grateful for everything I've learned—yes, even the mistakes I have made." (And her marriage to Shaw was one of them). "I am glad for everything that has happened to me. And when I have kids—and I will when the right man comes along—I hope my daughter won't be afraid of anything life has to deal out to her."

Philosophers have said the same thing in finer prose—but it has never been said with more sincerity. Otto told me about that conversation when he was trying to explain to me the kind of "kid" Lana is.

"She'll take anything in the world square on the chin—but sympathy," he said. "She can't stand that 'poor little Lana' talk. That kid is one of the rare human beings in the world. She knows she is living!"

I tell you that because it explains so perfectly why Lana chose the name of Cheryl—after nobody in particular—for her daughter, the little baby with masses of dark curly hair that she so deeply hopes will grow up to have a life of her own.

Make no mistake about one thing: Lana and Steve wanted that baby more than anything else in the world. It meant far more to them than the average baby because somehow it symbolized the new sane, balanced happiness they have found together. It meant the end of all the old quarrels and misunderstandings and heartaches. The baby meant the end of all that—and the beginning of their life together as just Mr. and Mrs. Family, away from all of the gaudy headlines and the glaring spotlight that has followed them since they met.

Few women have ever carried a baby through more emotional turbulence in their personal lives than Lana was called upon to face. She had known she was going to have a baby for two months when the news burst like a bombshell upon Hollywood, and on Lana, too, that her marriage was not legal because Steve Crane was not free of a former marriage to Carol Kurtz Crane.

There was the agonizing parting of the annulment proceedings with the California Courts granting Lana the slight solace of the legality of her child because she was the "innocent party."

There were the bitter months of misunderstanding that followed. In his heartbreak, Steve just went haywire. Even the best intentioned friends in the world said Lana was well rid of him. That black night that his car mysteriously careened off a cliff and he lay in a hospital not caring much whether he pulled through or not, Lana's friends thought it best that she issue a statement that they were through.

"Steve and I will not be remarried," is what she said—and what it cost her to say it no one will ever know. For at that time no one knew how very much Lana and the tall, good-looking playboy of the night clubs loved one another.

There were a great many things Hollywood did not know from that point on. At a time when other women in her condition are being spared as much emotional strain as possible, in the sixth month of carrying her child, Lana made the most important decision of her life, and she made it alone. She and Steve were remarried, once again to the tune of blaring headlines and the even more blaring arguments from outsiders about whether or not she had made the right move toward her happiness.

Her only explanation was: "We love each other. We always have. Soon, Steve is going into the Army. I want him to go away knowing that his family is waiting for him when he comes back."

And because the little Turner girl is never let off anything, she knew the cynical attitude Hollywood was assuming toward her remarriage. She knew they were saying: "If she couldn't be happy with him once—what makes her think they will be happy now?"

She made no explanation publicly, but to the few friends close to her and Steve, she said: "He's a different person from the boy I married. I know I am a different person from the girl he married. For the past few months Steve has been up at Fort MacArthur in the Army, and the life he has lived there has completely changed him. He has new ideals. He has made new friends. All the old restlessness that used to make people call Steve a playboy has gone out of him. He has his feet on the ground, and he is happier and more contented than I have ever known him to be. He's just a different person from the boy he was when we first met."

You had only to see them together when Steve came down on leave from Fort MacArthur to know how truly Lana spoke. Steve had been twice rejected by the Army doctors, and put himself on a health regime for months until finally he could pass his physical. Lana was never the kind of expectant mother who treated herself like a glamorous invalid while she was carrying her baby. She belonged to the school of young moderns, healthy, well, and strong, who scoff at the idea of pampering themselves.

When anything important came up, when she was asked to appear for any worthy cause, she didn't beg off because of her condition. She could have so easily—but she didn't.

When Madame Chiang Kai-shek made her momentous visit to Hollywood, Lana was asked to serve on the reception committee at the Hollywood Bowl. All the important stars of Hollywood were there, but there was something especially gallant about Lana to me, hugging an enormous fur coat in front of her, sitting in the hot sun for hours, her eager face turned up avidly to every word spoken by the great lady.

And when Steve was in town, you could see them shopping in the little stores of Beverly Hills and Westwood in a car with the top down, Lana's hair blowing in the breeze.

If anyone suggested to Lana that she take things more carefully she said, "Why? I feel wonderful. I never felt better in my life."

AND so the time came when little Lana, who is never let off anything, went to the hospital to have her baby. It should have been in the cards that there would be no more worries for these two—Lana and Steve. The baby arrived, a beautiful little thing, so perfect that when Steve saw her he said, "Why, she looks just like a miniature of Lana—only her hair is darker."

But even in this moment that should have been all theirs the headlines crept back into their lives when it was learned of the infant's rare ailment.

The doctors say it is responding to treatment so courageously that it is all right for Steve to return to camp. And even those people who used to wonder whether Lana and Steve were right for each other are not being cynical any more.

They are right for each other. They are wholeheartedly and beautifully in love. They have earned this happiness.

They were Mr. and Miss when this picture was taken—Greer and Richard—in fact, it was before Ensign Ney went off to the Aleutians.

WHY GREER GARSON DECIDED TO MARRY

By MICHAEL SHERIDAN

At six forty-five of a midsummer afternoon, before the altar of a small church in Santa Monica, California, one of the world's finest actresses and one of the bravest and handsomest of U.S. Navy officers stood exchanging the vows of holy matrimony.

The date was July 24, 1943. Their names were Greer Garson and Richard Ney, but at that moment they were not thinking either of fame or the future. They were, for that instant, exactly like thousands of other lovers everywhere, a fellow in uniform and his girl, rushing their wedding during that little interval of leave from the fighting front.

It was, in fact, for Greer and Richard Ney the next-to-the-last day of his ten-day leave. The headlines the next day were to say that Greer and Richard suddenly made up their minds to marriage, that he had conquered Greer's desire to wait until victory for the wedding. This is not true.

Greer grins impishly and says, "We would have been married eight months ago when we first got our license if it hadn't been for the existence of the three day California marriage laws. Eight months ago Richard's leave wasn't long enough for us to get the license and wait those necessary three days. When Richard left that time, we were determined that if he got back on another leave, then we would have the ceremony."

There were in those intervening months, however, several problems. As the dramatic queen of the movie box-office, Greer knew that if she announced that she would be married at the first given opportunity, her life would have been made miserable by the constant inquiries as to when the great event was to take place. The telephone would ring every fifteen minutes with inquiries from friends, reporters, and the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio.

Greer wisely therefore said nothing at all and let reporters guess what they would. But when Richard Ney did get a leave that brought him to Hollywood in mid-July, the course of this very true love did not run smoothly. Instead of being exquisite romance, it insisted upon being a comedy of errors.

AFTER eight months' service, mostly in the Aleutians, Richard came back to Hollywood a much more mature, gaunt young man than when he left, but with his eyes shining at the sight of Greer's beauty. They planned to be together every moment, and for their very first call, they went to visit Sidney Franklin, Greer's producer and the man who had originally introduced them to one another. They had met in Franklin's office when "Mrs. Miniver" was being cast. They had immediately been very aware of one another, the titian-haired Irish-English girl and the tall, subtle American actor making his movie debut, and they fell more and more in love during the weeks that they worked together. Sidney Franklin has produced all the Garson pictures since then, "Random Harvest" and the just-finished "Madame Curie," and he has always felt like a godfather to the Garson-Ney romance.

THUS on his first day of freedom from action, Richard felt he must call on Franklin. "So what happened?" says Greer. "It was a very hot day, and Sidney's swimming pool looked wonderfully inviting. We quickly changed into suits. We quickly plunged in. We had a wonderful time, marvelous. And then I went home and developed the worst cold I've ever suffered. I ran such a fever that the doctor put me to bed for four solid days. He wouldn't let anyone come near me, and quite right, too, for I was a complete hospital of cold germs. So Richard spent all those four days taking out my mother!"

By the beginning of the next week, however, Greer was up and around, and very secretly she and Richard decided upon Saturday for the wedding. They told no one, not even Greer's mother. They went out dancing together. Dancing is one of their great bonds in common. Richard is an extraordinarily fine dancer, and Greer loves music and rhythm with an absolute passion. The fact that they made no announcement, coupled with the fact that just before Richard's return, Greer had been seen out once or twice with Benny Thau who had been her devoted suitor before she met Ney, threw Hollywood completely off the trail.

Saturday finally dawned. Everything looked perfect. Too perfect. MGM called. Miss Garson was needed at the studio immediately for some added scenes on "Madame Curie."

The lovers groaned. Greer knew if she revealed her plans the studio would put off the retakes, but in that case, they would want to give out publicity on the forthcoming event and then, immediately after the wedding, they would undoubtedly want to finish up the film. Greer quickly made her decision. She'd do the added scenes, and be married, too. She would this way, at least, have privacy for a little while and a brief scrap of an undisturbed honeymoon.

SO ALL that very warm late July day, Greer was busy on "Madame Curie." To those on the set it was all studio commonplace. Blazing lights, streaming make-up, frayed tempers, just another of those awkward anti-climaxes when a great picture is all but finished and the mood of it all a little gone from their blood.

Richard Ney was just another set visitor, but a welcome one. Richard Ney who was older and rather tired looking with lines under his eyes. Richard Ney who had been in the headlines himself with his experiences under fire in the Aleutians. Thoughts of what he had gone through in that campaign made working on the set that much easier. The thought of bursting shrapnel, choking mists, and infested foxholes mocked the general studio discomforts. No one noticed that Greer and the tall, handsome young Ensign were strangely silent, almost subdued.

It was not until they were safely back in the hall of Greer's home, greeted by the gracious white-haired Nina Garson, that their quiet reserve gave way. Greer threw herself into her mother's arms and Richard started to laugh. It was the first real, unrepressed joy that the moment which had been uppermost in the minds and hearts of both Greer and Richard for almost a year was at last at hand, something concrete and real and beyond further postponement. The rest was a quick trip to the church, but even then not as quick as Greer wanted it.

After Greer and Richard returned from the studio—but you'll have to read about that afternoon just before their marriage.

"For one thing," she says laughingly, "I had nothing to wear. That sounds ridiculous, doesn't it? A woman with marriage uppermost in her mind all these months, with nothing to wear. But it's true. I haven't gone out a lot since Richard was away, and work on my last three pictures had been really so hard that when I got home, I was glad to stay there. Week-ends and evenings I'm always pottering in the garden and for that I've accumulated a glamorous wardrobe of gardening hats, denim overalls, and play suits. But those are hardly the things for a wedding."

But by this time excitement had taken hold of the entire household. Mrs. Garson with one hand was busy rummaging in the closets for suitable clothes and with the other was frantically calling Santa Monica and the Rev. Richard Irving. Finally the Rev. Mr. Irving signified his agreement, to say nothing of his pleasure, for a wedding to take place that evening at the Presbyterian Church. And the closet gave forth an orchid crepe dress, a length of lime green net adorned with white shells as a snood, and shoes of the same color for the bridal feet.

With Richard giving himself a close shave in one room, Mrs. Garson now looking for something to wear herself, and Greer too happy to say or do anything but pace up and down the living room, the excitement soon crept into the kitchen. There the butler and his wife Gizella exchanged a knowing look, took down packages of cake flour and turned on the stove.

The ceremony was the simplest possible one, lasting only a few minutes with Mrs. Garson the only witness. The Rev. Richard Irving said, "It was just another wartime wedding, without pretentions, and very real. Instead of the bride being one of Hollywood's most glamorous actresses, she might have been just any ordinary young woman marrying her sailor." And that was exactly the wedding Greer wanted.

Immediately after the ceremony, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ney returned to the two-storied English house in Stone Canyon, so like the house in "Mrs. Miniver." Decorated throughout by Greer herself, who by the way is very good at that sort of thing, the house is typical of the homes you see in the cool, green English countryside. In English Tudor style it has been done inside for comfort and not effect; it is furnished so that a man might enjoy it as much as a woman.

Here the beaming servants were waiting for them. Halmos, the butler, who is an accomplished pianist besides, went to the piano and played the Wedding March, while his wife brought forth a tray of drinks and the hurriedly-baked cake, a wartime wedding cake a bit short on butter and eggs and guiltless of icing—not that anybody noticed. Finally Greer and her new husband and her mother sat down to dinner. "I've no idea what that was," Greer says, "just whatever happened to be in the house at the time."

The last day of Richard Ney's furlough they spent alone together, mostly in the garden. After the ice and terrible winds of the Aleutians, the Southern California garden seemed like heaven to the new groom. Richard preferred to talk about the future, the distant far-off future when the war is over. He is not certain that he will continue to be an actor. Writing is very much in his heart.

A graduate of Columbia University, he wears a service bar indicating action in the Pacific and Asiatic seas. Although he has written a book of his adventures under fire, he is not too prone to talk about what happened, or what the book is about. He only hopes that, when it is finished, Washington will approve his submitting it to publishers. Greer, herself of a fertile and inventive mind, would like to be married to a writer.

As for Richard, his only thought now is for the war's end and the beginning of his life with Greer. For them the fact that they were both married previously lies in the dim, hazy past.

Like all war-time couples they are idealists believing love is stronger than battles, stronger than distance, the greatest truest thing in the world.

Two days after their wedding Ensign Richard Ney, U.S.N., left to rejoin his unit. And in the garden, Greer, like other Navy wives, waits and dreams and prays.

The Case of the Curious BOGART

By GEOFFREY HOMES

ILLUSTRATED BY EXCLUSIVE PHOTOS BY MOVIELAND'S NAT DALLINGER, STAGED UNDER THE PERSONAL DIRECTION OF MR. GEOFFREY HOMES HIMSELF.

Left—Our author enters the Bogart mansion to find our hero completely surrounded by daggers, guns, and even picture cutters. Above—For no reason whatsoever our hero, together with Mr. Homes, gets up and brings in Mrs. Bogart to study nothing at all.

Below—Mr. Homes suggests they might find a clue to something down on the floor by flashlight so the Bogarts, no fools, look up in the other direction.

Being a strictly unorthodox interview in which the author of those best selling mysteries, "Forty Whacks," "The Street of Crying Women," and many others, examines the evidence against his best pal and finds him guilty of a couple of things

THERE I was staring into space, trying to figure out why there was a thousand-dollar confederate bill and a potted geranium in the dead woman's purse and what was the butterfly tattooed on the sole of her left foot for, when the phone rang and a dame named Waterbury wanted to talk about the mystery of Humphrey Bogart.

"The only mystery I know is why women like to look at that puss of his," I said. "Maybe you can tell me why a woman would carry a potted geranium around in her purse?"

"It would have to be a very big purse," said Waterbury. "Let me ask the questions."

"Shoot," I said.

"Are you Bogart's best friend?"

"I married him."

"What do you mean, you married him?"

"I was a little mixed up," I said. "There I was walking up the path to the spot where the judge and Bogey stood, and the organ started playing 'Here Comes the Bride.' Only it wasn't Mayo Methot coming, it was me. They had to start all over again."

"Do you and Bogart own an angle worm farm together?" asked Waterbury.

"Where did you get that?"

"I have his biographical file right in front of me. It also says you are co-owners of a flea circus."

"Pay no attention to that file," I said. "Hang up and let me figure out this problem, and after awhile I'll send you all the evidence I have on the man."

"All?" asked Waterbury.

"Well, almost all," I said.

A LONG time ago I was sitting in the publicity office at Fox studio when in walked the saddest looking cow-puncher you ever saw.

"This is the end," said the sad cowhand. "I hate horses. I hate guns. I hate chaps and spurs and big hats. So what do they do with me? They make me a villain in a horse opera. I'm through. I'm going back to New York." He let out a couple more moans, then departed dejectedly.

"Who was that?" I asked.

"Humphrey Bogart," I was told. "He's a juvenile we signed for his work in 'Cradle Snatchers.' Upstairs they don't think much of him so they are putting him in westerns."

If I remember, they put him in only one western, and after he had fallen off his horse a few times, he doffed his ten-gallon hat and went back to Broadway. Anyway, I didn't see him around Hollywood for quite a while. Nor did I hear his name mentioned. As a screen actor, Bogart was washed up. Then along about 1936 rumors began drifting West about a tough guy playing Duke Mantee in "Petrified Forest," and pretty soon there were the Warner Brothers, rolling out the plush carpet for Bogart, handing him contracts, giving him what is known in publicity circles as the business. As unit press agent on the film version of "Petrified Forest," I inherited Bogart. He was my baby. I was to build him up. I was to make his name a household word, something to frighten the children with on off days.

Some stars are sensitive about the stories you write about them. Take Pat O'Brien, for instance. He still resents—and bitterly—an item some imaginative fellow wrote about the ship that was tattooed on his chest and how Pat had the skin removed and made into a lamp shade. Bogart never—well, hardly ever—resented anything.

According to our publicity stories, Bogie inherited railroad stations from obscure relatives in France. He donned a beard and played a bull fiddle in a small orchestra. (His beard-wearing, bull-fiddle playing pal was sick that week and Humphrey subbed for him, we said.) The gateman didn't recognize him. He saved the lives of sixteen leading women by pushing them out of the way of falling sun arcs. He was the first on the list of the ten meanest men in the world. Incognito, he spent two weeks in jail to get in character for his next role. All this and more, according to us.

As a matter of fact, Bogart aided and abetted the publicity boys. Handing out an annual award to the best animal actor in pictures was his idea, though at first he insisted on giving the award to a young leading man on the lot. And making a trip down the Los Angeles river in a dugout canoe was also his idea. (He never did it—he wrote a piece about it.)

Only once were his feelings hurt. That was when a story came out about how he registered agony in a scene. He put his left shoe on his right foot and his right shoe on his left foot and his feet hurt so much he couldn't help but look pained.

"I'll get even for that," said Bogart. He did.

I HAD retired, temporarily, from press agenting—if I remember, it had something to do with a story about a beautiful star who cured her sore throat by gargling hot beer—and was in Fresno writing "No Hands on the Clock" when my clipping service began deluging me with items about the Bogarts and their friend, Geoffrey Homes.

The Bogarts, it seemed, were heading north on their honeymoon and every time they met a reporter they told him about Homes. Homes lived in a tree house and they were going to spend a week with him. They were demanding an accounting on the profits of the two Bogart-Homes ventures—an angle worm farm and a flea circus. Homes collected safety pins from the diapers of babies that became famous—like Thomas

This wounds Mr. Homes, who explains that if they don't pay attention, he may cut his throat.

Hardy and the Duke of Windsor. Homes was secretly in love with Olivia de Havilland and had spent three years with a cold chisel carving her face on a big rock.

If the campaign had sold any books, I wouldn't have minded. It didn't. It ran up my clipping bills, got my name on all the sucker lists in the country, reminded a newspaperman named Lionel Moise that I owed him fifty dollars, and had my wife looking down her nose at me every time she thought about Miss de Havilland.

I sent him a wire to desist, that he was even. He sent me back a huge slab of redwood with greetings from the Bogarts to their friend Homes burned into the wood. The trouble was he sent it C.O.D. and the charges amounted to seven dollars and thirty cents. A week later he sent me a lamp made of abalone shells, also C.O.D.

I didn't see him again for a year or so. I went East, and he stayed in Hollywood and made faces at the camera and somehow convinced the Warners that his talent was an everlasting flower, something to be cherished under a seven-year contract.

One snowy night someone rapped on the door of the joint I was occupying on West 56th Street in New York. It was Bogart, and he had two bottles of scotch under one arm, a chessboard under the other, and a battered prize fighter at his heels.

"Mayo's mad at me," said Bogart. "She doesn't like prize fighters."

We drank the scotch and played something approximating chess, and the prize fighter went to sleep. After a while we decided something should be done about Mayo, out there in the snow storm. She wasn't at 21, she wasn't at the Stork Club. She wasn't in Bleecks, which is sometimes called the Artists and Writers Club, and is the hangout of guys like Bogart, Dick Watts, and Howard Barnes of the Herald Tribune, Robert Benchley, Wolcott Gibbs of the New Yorker, and Stanley Walker. Bogart decided it was too cold to look for Mayo any more and that the thing we should do was write a play. We started one about a saloon in Stockton run by a slattern with an idiot son who sat through the whole performance with a spittoon in his lap. In the second act a girl came downstairs carrying a man's head under her arm.

"No use," said Bogart. "It's too grim. Let's write a mystery. It opens on a river. There's a guy living on a barge in the river, and he sees a rowboat floating downstream upside down. He turns it over, and there's a dead woman stuffed in it. In her purse there is a thousand dollar confederate bill and a potted geranium. She has a butterfly tattooed on the sole of her left foot."

"Go on," I suggested.

"That's your racket," said Bogart. "Anyway, we haven't time. We have to find Mayo."

We stopped at a couple of other places, but she wasn't there. But a girl who sold big stuffed Scotty dogs was, so Humphrey bought one, and we took the dog to the Algonquin Hotel where the Bogarts were staying. Mayo wasn't in their suite.

"That's gratitude for you," said Bogart. "I bring a beautiful dog and what happens? She isn't home. I won't stay here." So he got another suite, and I left.

I didn't find out for three months how that row came out. Next morning I left town for some spot where a man could figure out, in peace and quiet, why the dead woman had the potted geranium in her purse. I discovered when I saw them again, that it—the row—came out all right. Mayo had come back to the room and finding it empty had, in high dudgeon, taken another suite on the floor above. She was awakened next day by the maid pushing the stuffed dog into her bedroom.

"I forgave him," said Mayo. "That is, I forgave him until we got a bill for three suites. Imagine his doing a thing like that."

"Did you get the mystery worked out?" Bogart wanted to know.

I handed him a copy of "Forty Whacks." That book opens with a guy on a barge who sees a rowboat floating downstream, turns it over and finds a woman's body in it.

"You left out the best part," said Bogart. "What about the potted geranium and the thousand-dollar confederate bill and the tattooed butterfly?"

I told him I was saving those items. I am. One of these days I'm going to corner the guy. I'm going to get him out on his boat where he can't get away and let him worry about them.

I guess though maybe I've solved why dames like to see him on screen and why Warners keep shelling out that hard money to him. The camera's got an eye sharper than an antique dealer's for anything phony, and the Bogart comes up real. If he ever went in for any kind of faking—which I doubt—he's long since been at the place where he's strictly himself all the time, and you can take him or leave him, Joe, but that's the way it is. He likes acting, and he knows how to do it, but he no more puts on a beard about it than does the plumber who comes up to the house to fix the hot water heater.

It looks like I find him guilty of being pretty regular, which crime is one you can't accuse too many actors of.

THE END

This offers only one solution to Bogie and Mayo. They go away, out of their own house, leaving Geoff alone to his story. And is he stuck with it!

Miss CHRISTINA CRAWFORD-TERRY ENTERTAINS the VERY YOUNGEST SET

The occasion was Christina's fourth birthday. The setting was Miss Crawford-Terry's Brentwood estate (oh, okay Joan Crawford and Philip Terry's place, if you insist). 'Tina has twenty of her most intimate friends—the very cream of the kindergarten crowd, my dears.

Above—At four one is simply keen for Shetland ponies, particularly when one's papa helps you into the saddle. Right—Naturally if Tina took a ride, new baby, Philip Terry, Jr., had to go aloft the pony, too, while Mama Joan hung on like crazy.

Miss Personality of 1943, or Miss Melinda Nolan, very busy daughter of Mr. Lloyd Nolan, who has personality, too.

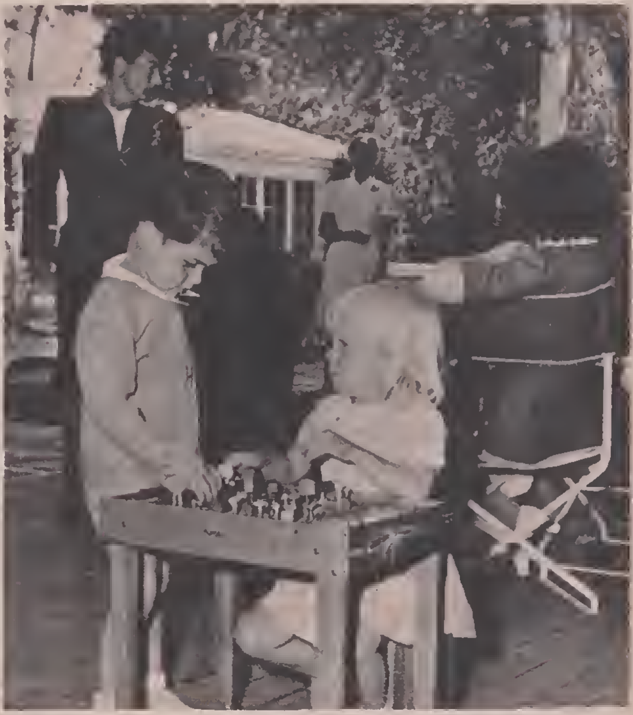
Miss Nolan, Mr. Converse, and bland Mr. Guilaroff play, too.



Danny Milland, also four, takes up a game with Bridget Hayward.

Tarquin Olivier, son of Laurence Olivier, has to show everybody just how strong he is. Christina's mama then shows she's strong, too, by picking Tarquin up in the air.

The festive board, the paper caps, the creamed chicken, the ice cream, and the birthday cake! All wonderful. Tina seated her guests thus: at her right and down the line are Joyce Converse, Tarquin Olivier, Brooke Hayward, Bridget Hayward, Howard Long, and Joan Converse. At Tina's left are Linda Macauley, Danny Milland, Roger Converse, Maria Cooper, Sharon Macauley.

This is a really terrific moment for little Tina—and pretty exciting for Mama and Papa, too, it seems—when the presents are opened.

When outdoor games tire, there is nothing like coming into the playroom for a screaming round of Tail on the Donkey.

But some people don't easily tire of outdoor sports, as for instance, Susie MacMurray and Tarquin. And we just had to show you at the far right that the fatal young Mr. Milland proves he inherited almost as much beauty from his lovely mother, Mal, as he does from his dashing dad, Ray.

Tap, above—Everybody's watching Danny Milland, sunk so deep in the safa (and aut af the picture) that he almost didn't get ta pin the tail. Everybady's Susie, her nurse, Mrs. Gary Caaper, Mrs. Ray Milland, and Ja Anne Lang. Bottam, abave, Tarquin grapes his way taward the dankey.

The winner af the tail an the donkey contest—Tarquin Olivier. (His prize was a twenty-five-dallar war bond in stamps, and did he have a fine time licking thase stamps and shawing them ta his mather, Jill Esmand.) Tina threw her arms araund him and tald the crawds, "Tarquin is my best friend." Said Tarq, very male and uncamfartable, "Awwwww!"

Mama and Papa, having the idea that little girls should nat anly receive but give an their birthdays, Tina hands twa twenty-five-dallar bands ta Miss Waterbury ta take ta the Hollywaad Canteen and have raffled off far twa lucky service men in Christina's own name.

Paulette is convinced that girls are going to have to take care of their cars themselves—so she's taking a course in auto mechanics at the Paramount Studio machine shop. She attends "school" two hours each week-day evening. Teaching her what makes a motor tick is mechanic Wes Haight.

PAULETTE GODDARD, the girl on Movieland's cover this month and the most sophisticated young woman in Hollywood at anytime, has gone back to the soil. She has become a farmer. We mean in person, not a picture. This newest enterprise of hers reveals much about her as a person.

Some glamour girls have been farmers' daughters, but Paulette, by cracky, is the farmer herself! This may come as a bit of a shock to you. If ever there was a girl who doesn't seem to have even a touch of blue denim in her nature, it's Paulette. Michael Arlen, sophisticate among scribblers, says she is the most civilized lass in Hollywood. And a less famous, but equally observing gentleman recently remarked after he had met up with her on the Paramount lot that she always looks exactly the way a motion picture actress should look. But rarely does.

The most supercilious head waiters just naturally hover behind Paulette's chair. Those grand ladies who deign to sell merchandise in smart shops never snoot her. She's unmistakably labeled important.

Nevertheless, Paulette bought a farm a few months ago. And she's making it pay. How she is making it pay! We'll go into that. Miss G. owns a tidy seventy acres near Suffern in Spring Valley, New York State. It is called the Camp Hill Farm. The new mistress did not choose the name. It has been known as Camp Hill for one hundred and fifty years, ever since the main house, which still stands solidly dominating the landscape, was used as headquarters by "Mad" Anthony Wayne. The old Revolutionary Road goes close past the front door.

It is a handsome house filled with fine antique furniture. All Paulette has added are some paintings (her latest hobby is collecting works of art) and the flat silver. The way she got the silver fits into her plan of operation for the property and will be dealt with in due course later in this report.

Paulette bought the place as it stands, together with the outlying acres, from Burgess Meredith. There have been romance rumors about these two, but Hollywood has never taken them seriously. Miss Goddard is distinctly a career girl, and Burgess now is serving in England as a lieutenant in the Air Corps. He acquired the farm for its beauty without thought of making it pay for itself. After all, it had been a luxurious country estate for thirty years.

But, strange as it may seem to those who think of all motion picture stars as pretty dolls who never use their brains, Paulette is a business woman. Moreover, Paulette is patriotic. She believes fallow ground is a crime against the body politic these days. So when she bought the farm, she decided to make it produce and profit.

Betty at the left with Dixie Lee (Mrs. Bing Crosby) and another chorus girl in 1929. They were all in a picture for the old Fox Company where Dixie was a star. Betty made "Let's Go Places" there and was a chorus girl in "Whoopee," starring Eddie Cantor.

With two chorus girls in "Kiki" in 1930.

She did "Nitwits" with Wheeler and Woolsey in 1934 for RKO. She had been signed by RKO in 1932 and was way in the background of Ginger Rogers' "The Gay Divorcee" that year. Even when she played the lead in "Nitwits," no one expected her to get anywhere.

In 1936 Betty was free lancing, but she was becoming known around Hollywood. At Fox she made "Pigskin Paradise"; Judy Garland is the drab little girl at the left.

Paramount signed her in 1936. She made "This Way, Please" with Buddy Rogers.

With Leif Ericson in "The Thrill of a Lifetime."

In 1937 she married Jackie Coogan. Here they are at the wedding reception at Betty's home November of that year.

It wasn't a happy marriage. Betty and Jackie separated. Betty left Paramount and Hollywood and went to New York. In the winter of 1940 she became the toast of Broadway in "DuBarry Was a Lady." Hollywood called her back. Alice Faye was ill, and Betty took her place in "Down Argentine Way." Overnight the whole town knew their cutie had grown up and that a real star was born.

Followed "Moon Over Miami," "A Yank in the R.A.F.," "Hot Spot," "Song of the Islands." Grable was at last acclaimed a real star.

She began being seen with George Raft, her first serious beau since her divorce.

In 1942 and 1943 came "Footlight Serenade," "Springtime in the Rockies," and "Coney Island." Betty became top box-office girl of the whole movie industry.

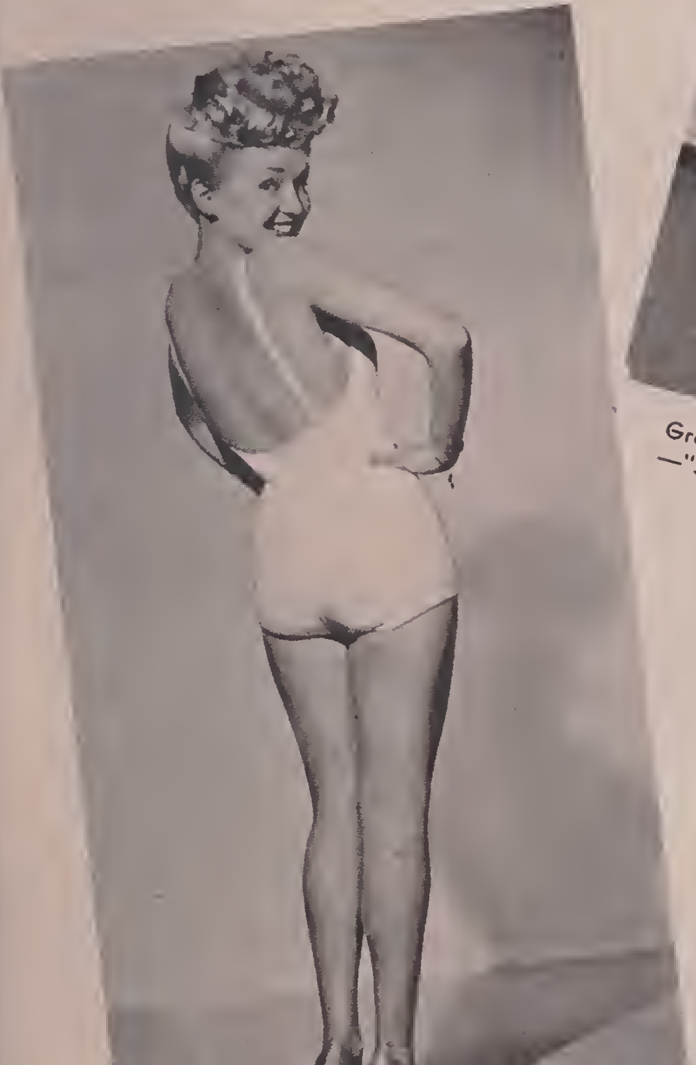
Grable's next picture to be released—"Sweet Rosie O'Grady."



The most famous shot of Grable ever taken (yes, we know we ran it before!!) was entirely an accident. Grable was posing for bathing suit art in the 20th Century-Fox gallery. Director Irving Cummings, entering, called to her. Grable looked over her shoulder to answer and pop! went the camera man. Within a week of this particular photo's publication ten thousand service men (truly, by actual count) write in asking for it. Twentieth sent it out. They still send out approximately a thousand a week of these—their bit for the war effort.

Her newest (and only recent one with a modern setting) is "Pin Up Girl"—now shooting.

THE IMMORTAL WESTERNS

IF YOU want to get rich in Hollywood, get a dozen horses, some cowboys, cattlemen, villains, and assorted colorful characters of the West, a Robin Hood of the range and a heroine-in-distress, and shoot a Western picture.

Said picture doesn't have to be good, though it doesn't harm it if it is. It should not be original. But regardless of what it is, as long as it's a Western, it will coin wealth immediately.

In all the forty years Westerns have been made, not one of them ever lost money. The first "Hopalong Cassidy" picture, which Harry ("Pop") Sherman made nine years ago, is still playing to capacity crowds in South America, Mexico, India, China, and Australia, still bringing in money. Sherman just finished his 50th "Hopalong Cassidy" picture ("Riders of the Deadline") which should bring in money until 1952. You can't speak with such surety of any other investment in these uncertain times. This same set-up applies to all Western movies, but the "Hoppies" are a perfect example.

To crash New York's Radio City Music Hall, which is the summit of movie "show cases," a Western has to be disguised as a Saga of the Old West or an Outdoors Epic. "The Covered Wagon," "Dodge City," "Jesse James," John Ford's "Stagecoach," and de Mille's "Union Pacific" did crash the big cities. But take, for instance, "Union Pacific": eliminate the railroad-and-Irish-laborer sequences, the love scenes and most of the dialogue, and what have you got? A good, old-fashioned Western with all its ingredients of action and shooting, of hard-riding Indians and hard-fighting U. S. Cavalry men, with a terrific chase and the cloppety-clop sound of horses' hooves.

Hollywood's attitude toward Westerns has been one of arrogance mixed with embarrassed jealousy. But Hollywood cannot ignore the facts. The facts are that Westerns are continuously played in fourteen thousand, five hundred out of the nation's eighteen thousand movie houses. Westerns are seen by more people than any other group of pictures. Theater-men all over the country reluctantly agree to play an "arty" highbrow picture, provided they can get a good Western that fills up the theater.

In South America and the Far East the most popular American stars are Bill Boyd and Gene Autry, and not the Academy Award winners. This is almost equally true of our own small towns. Westerns have outgrown the Saturday matinee stage; outside the large cities they are seen by all the members of the family, not merely the small boys in grammar school. Fifty per cent of Gene Autry's fans are women.

Contrary to popular opinion, the Westerns were not born in America. The first Westerns were made, forty years ago, in Southern France by a group of enterprising movie producers who figured our famed West would make a swell movie background. None of those gentlemen had ever set foot on American soil and their ideas of the Wild West were strictly on the fantastic side. They dressed their cowboys in flash satin blouses and silk trousers which would not have survived a single cloudburst; the horses were all dolled up; and the ladies-in-distress were musical comedy queens, wearing high black stockings.

In 1916 Harry Sherman became one of the first producers of Westerns in this country. He insisted on realism. He wanted real scenery, real outdoor settings; his cowboys wore their cotton (not silk) shirts open at the neck; the horses were real ranch horses. The actors were real cowhands, and their dungarees were faded by sun and rain. Audiences slowly got used to authenticity, and the success of the Westerns has been phenomenal ever since.

The story formula is still the same as forty years ago: the ridin', ropin', shootin' hero arrives just as the lovely, helpless heroine is being threatened by a gang of sinister villains, who steal her father's cattle, or want to throw him off the land. After a noisy period of fighting there is a climax and a terrific chase, the villains get killed or arrested, and the heroine waves to the Robin Hood of the range, as he slowly rides out into the sunset.

There are the same bits of dialogue, used over and over again. "I'll give you one hour to git out o' town, Jim. After that, you'd better start reachin' . . ."

"Law? (Derisive belly-laugh) There ain't no law in this here town but me!"

Those words appeared as titles in the silent era; now they are being spoken; but otherwise nothing has changed. Throughout the decades, boys from seven to seventy, and girls as well, have paid billions of admission money to see their Westerns. Those people can't be wrong.

Of the three kinds of Western pictures, the "quickie" is the poorest. It's made in less than a week; once it cost ten thousand dollars, and even today its budget never exceeds thirty-five thousand dollars, in contrast to "major" productions costing between one and three million dollars each. There is only the skeleton of a story, few horses (never more than seven), since horses are expensive. Frequently there is no money for horses at all; the riders come into a room, take off their hats and pretend to be breathless, uttering, "What a swell ride we had!" In quickies, location trips are out of the question; everything is done on the stage. The actors display a remarkable versatility, impersonating the good men as well as villains. As good men they stand behind the hero, kind hearted and smiling; then they put on villainous mustaches, mumbling dark threats against the hero. Such pictures please mainly the little American boys and natives in faraway countries.

The other extreme is the epic saga of the West, a super production from five hundred thousand dollars up, featuring colorful backgrounds, big names, a rather pretentious story rich in historical flavor, impressive disaster, lots of horses, and armies of extras.

Group three is the real, straight Western, action and reality. Pop Sherman's "Hopalong Cassidy" pictures are among the best liked in this group. Their titles—"Secret of the Wastelands," "Sheik of Buffalo Buttes," "Timberwolves," "False Colors"—reveal their spirit. They have clear plot, fast action, a minimum of dialogue, plenty of shooting, superlative outdoor photography. The first six "Hoppies" cost seventy-five thousand dollars each, grossed one and a half million dollars.

Today their budget runs around one hundred thousand dollars; shooting time fourteen days, seven of which are spent on location. Since the war, Sherman shoots two pictures at once, saving on time, gasoline, tires, location trips. He takes the same crew and cast for both pictures, and a different leading lady for each. Careful research is done; regional newspapers of the period in which the story takes place are studied in order to give historical background detail. Bill Boyd wears the same simple dark blue, menacing outfit in all his pictures. "Cowboys don't own an elaborate wardrobe," Pop Sherman says. Boyd is accompanied by Andy Clyde ("California Carlson"), the bewhiskered hungry cowboy sidekick of Hopalong; and Jimmy Rogers, who plays Hoppy's protege and the romantic lead. Bill is always the Knight Errant, or the champion of the wronged. There is a different leading lady in every film; some of them (Lola Lane, Frances Gifford, Barbara Britton, Margaret Hayes) have attained fame outside The Range.

A new note was brought into Westerns when Republic found a cowboy with a good singing voice by the name of Gene Autry and started making musical Westerns. Old time Westerners reluctantly admit that some musicals ain't bad; but they are, they insist, a fad. They view with suspicion the appearance of night club scenes and dude girls in a Western; they don't trust a cowboy who sits on a fence and sings. Bill Hart, that first great screen cowboy (strictly from the East) would hardly have recognized the Old West as presented in a musical Western. The old time villains—horse thieves, cattle rustlers, desperadoes, half-breeds, and "foreigners"—have now been replaced by the more topical bankers and businessmen. Right now, singing cowboys are doing most of their fighting against the dirty tricks of crooked capitalists.

A still from an oldie—Republic's "New Frontier" away back in 1939. But it shows John Wayne, who does both Westerns and big features (he's in "A Lady Takes A Chance" with Jean Arthur), Sammy McKim, and Phyllis Isley, who's now Jennifer Jones in "The Song of Bernadette."

Songs are never used for the sake of singing—the fans would resent that—but in order to advance the plot. In "Mexicali Rose," for instance, a group of wicked oil promoters hired Gene Autry to sing on the radio. Gene uncovered the fraud and sang the exposé. Roy Rogers, King of the Cowboys, Republic's super-hero, uses his voice for similar pertinent purposes.

All Westerns, from the quickest quickie to the most elaborate saga, are dominated by taboos. They run down sex. Their public admires Bill Boyd and Wild Bill

Read what Dick Foran says about a hero in a good Western. And say, if you want to know about the private life of merely one Western star, turn to page 52, and look at John Mack Brown's home.

This is the guy that put tunes in the great open spaces! Gene Autry alongside Champ.

Remember Republic's "Carson City Cyclone"? There's Bryant Washburn, old time star, on the left, and Roy Bancroft on the right. In the middle is Don Barry, that fast-ridin', quick-shootin' Western hero.

Elliott because they can ride and rope and shoot; they would bitterly resent their hero spending his time with such utterly silly things as girls. The hero never makes love to a girl, never hugs or kisses her unless it is part of a plot to ensnare the criminal—in which case the reason will be made perfectly clear, otherwise sixty thousand enraged fans are apt to write in. The hero doesn't drink or smoke. If he is forced to step into a bar to pursue his gallant activities, he asks for a soft drink; if the villain (who drinks all he wants to) serves him hard liquor, the hero pours it away.

"Then the hero has always got to be good to his horse," Dick Foran explains. "Every picture has to point to a moral, and it's good business to have your horse save you at least once in every Western. Once the hero draws his gun, he never misses. If the hero and villain shoot it out, the hero gives the villain a break on the draw."

Western heroes, off-screen, are most sincere people in Hollywood. They live their screen life. Unlike some of the screen's tough guys who change at close sight, the Western men can stand the test of their fans. If an admirer of Boyd, Rogers, or Elliot would step into his hero's house, he would find that they don't drink or smoke. Most of them don't own regulation street clothes. They raise horses and cattle and work on their ranches, and dress in purely Western style, the same off-screen as on. In the world of Hollywood, where so many things are phoney, they are a refreshing sight of sincerity, devoid of any pretense. They talk about horses and fishing and hunting; their hobbies consist of collecting fishing tackle, rare saddles, and horseman's trophies. They play themselves on the screen; Autry is always Autry, Roy Rogers always is "Roy Rogers," and Bill Elliott appears as "Wild Bill Elliott." Even Bill Boyd has lost his identity and is called "Hoppy" by everybody.

Cowboy stars on the set display the same forthright, quiet attitude that has made them the heroes of the range. Sophisticated debs who wouldn't sit through a Western for anything in the world, have been visibly shaken when they were greeted by Wild Bill Elliott. ("The cowboy always takes off his hat when talking to a lady," Mr. Elliott says. "He is gallant, looking into her eyes.")

Each of the leading Western stars has his own distinctive personality. No fan will ever confound them; which is another smart move of the Western makers. Bill Boyd, who likes to call himself a "character actor," got his first break in the early de Mille pictures before he became "Hoppy"—a silent, strong man, who never draws a gun unless he really means business. Republic's Don Barry is the old fast-ridin', quick-shootin' Western hero, hard as nails and the terror of all outlaws. Wild Bill Elliott is a "peaceable, law-abiding citizen," but when the heavies get his dander up, they had best make for the nearest exit.

Elliott's career is typically colorful. At sixteen he appeared in rodeo events of the American Royal Livestock Show in Kansas City. Hollywood casting directors turned him into a swank, drawing room type, and it took him seven years to get the kind of screen work he wanted to do.

Roy Rogers is in a special class. He picked peaches as a migratory worker in California, drove a sand and gravel truck, danced and sang in mining towns, was an entertainer at the Grand Canyon lodges, and formed his own cowboy band, "Sons of the Pioneers," before he crashed the movies. He still goes on hunting expeditions, using bow and arrow; when he bought his estate from Martha Raye, he converted the swank swimming pool into a hay storage bin for his horses. His famous Palomino horse, "Trigger," can count to ten, open and close doors, pick up a gun from a holster, roll a barrel with his nose. Trigger gets equal star billing with Roy, as his contract demands.

Western stars have a tremendous following. Roy Rogers' records sell at the rate of six thousand a week; Bill Boyd's fan mail runs about five thousand letters weekly; Gene Autry received twelve thousand letters a week before he went into the Army, more than any of our glamour heart-throbs.

Western stars know that they have to live up to their fans' ideals. They go out on long, nerve-wracking per-

You'd better not miss Roy Rogers and Trigger in another Republic picture—"Silver Spurs."

About Bill Boyd and Harry Sherman and the "Hopalong Cassidy" series—after the fiftieth "Hoppy" they had a party, and has-beens and still-ares of the series came along. We caught a foursome at the cake. Barbara Britton on the left, who started in a "Hoppy," and Jane Wyatt, between Bill and Sherman, who is now in one of them.

sonal appearance tours, visting orphanages, schools, giving talks at Rotary luncheons, over the radio, at the local theaters, letting little boys touch them (often the boys write after many months, "Remember, when you were there and I touched your guns?"), living for weeks almost without sleep, lunching on popcorn; always dashing, smiling, friendly, always eager to give their public what they expect.

"When I go out on a thirty-day tour," says Smiley Burnette, the two hundred and thirty-pound cowboy comic, "I take thirty suits of underwear with me. I know there'll be no time for laundry, believe me. There will be the dreary dressing rooms of local movie houses, with the plaster falling from the walls. I always carry newspapers and put them on the walls—upside down, so I won't go crazy reading the papers."

But there are compensations. Western stars work only three or four months a year. For example, Bill Boyd makes six pictures a year, doing them all in twelve weeks, spends nine months on his farm.

Cowboy heroes have the most sincere following on earth. They don't have to worry about being washed up this year or next. Westerns have been in style for a long time, and it looks as if they're here to stay.

"If a cowboy doesn't let his public down," Gene Autry once said, "he is good for fifty years if he can only live that long."

THE END

"The cowboy always takes off his hat when talking to a lady." That's what we heard from Bill Elliott in Republic's "Wagon Tracks West."

Movieland Selects Five "Best" Pictures This Month

FOR WHOM THE BELL TOLLS

(Paramount)

A GREAT story, a superb cast, a very great director, a magnificent production and one of the finest musical scores in years. All these unite to form "For Whom the Bell Tolls," a picturization of Ernest Hemingway's tale about an American college professor fighting with a small band of guerrillas in the Spanish civil war.

Robert Jordan's mission is to blow up one small bridge. It is closely guarded by the enemy, in a mountain district strange to him. He has to secure the aid of the guerrilla chieftain, Pablo, and seeking him out, Jordan finds Pilar, Pablo's woman, and Maria, a beautiful girl, just recovering from the horror of seeing her parents killed, her home destroyed. She herself has been a victim of a lust-maddened horde.

There are only three days for Robert Jordan and Maria, days into which they pack the emotions of a lifetime. Their idyllic love is menaced, not only by war and the swiftly approaching enemy, but more immediately by Pablo. The ending is tragic but exalting.

Running for three full hours, there are, unfortunately, dull, slow passages. The dozen assorted accents of the large cast will make understanding difficult for many audiences, yet Gary Cooper and Ingrid Bergman are tremendously moving as the lovers. Akim Tamiroff is very touching as the bewildered, bedeviled Pablo. Mikhail Rasumny is enchanting as a Spanish gypsy, Joseph Calleia very sly as El Sordo, and Lilo Yarson heart-pulling as Joaquin. But the high point of the acting is Katina Paxinou as Pilar. Here is one of the most powerful portrayals the screen has ever revealed—and that from an actress making her movie debut!

SO PROUDLY WE HAIL

(Paramount)

IN this war, women are fighters, too, and no women are giving their services more gallantly than our women nurses. "So Proudly We Hail" excitingly and poignantly tells the story of three such women on Bataan in those dark days when our outnumbered troops were fighting their very desperate delaying action.

A group of gay girls, well trained in their profession, they start out on what they think will be a pleasant assignment in the Philippines, not dreaming of the horrors that will await them in the Islands.

One of them, Claudette Colbert, is the intelligent, sensible lieutenant, daughter of an Army officer, scorning romance but finding it in the person of George Reeves. Another, Paulette Goddard, is just the opposite type, the flirt incarnate, until a big, tough, bewildered marine wanders in. The third, Veronica Lake, is a mystery girl, difficult, irritable, taciturn, but it is she who proves the bravest of them all.

Once again, Hollywood produces living history as you see the way these girls meet their different destinies. The Lake role is the smallest of the three leads, giving no opportunity for the usual Lake glamour. Claudette Colbert brings all her subtle showmanship, her beauty, and her charm to the exacting role of the Lieutenant, but it is Paulette Goddard who is the surprise of the production. She is amorous, then serious. She is saucy and then compellingly dramatic. This sets Goddard's stardom.

Sunny Tufts, as the Marine, is an interesting new type. George Reeves, now in the Army, is very handsome and authentic as the soldier who finds his great love right on the brink of death.

BEST FOOT FORWARD

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

GAIETY from beginning to end. Apart from Lucille Ball and Broadway's William Gaxton, the majority of the cast consists of kids, new to the screen, and all of them turn in refreshing performances.

Winsocki Military Academy is planning its senior prom, and festive preparations are being made by the cadets for the long awaited arrival of the girls, or pardon us, the "quail." Tommy Dix is the cadet in a tizzie because the motion picture star, Lucille Ball, has accepted his written invitation to be his date for the evening. He's unhappy about the whole thing, as he wrote the invitation for fun, never expecting the star to take him up on it. Besides, he's in love with his girl, Virginia Weidler, who is naturally expecting that she'll be his date.

Thus when Lucille turns up (she has come only for the publicity), Tommy informs her that no one knows she's coming — that he's turned in his girl's name and will she be so good as to go under said name to the prom?

Gaxton, as Lucille's press agent, tells Tommy that Lucille will do no such thing, and Tommy writes Virginia that he has the measles. Of course, Virginia comes to the school anyway, and from then on it's a riot of wacky confusion.

Several of the youngsters, including Tommy Dix, were imported from New York where they had been appearing in the stage play. Nancy Walker contributes many howls with her new brand of antics as the girl who can't get a date. It's full of swell songs and dances, and last and most wonderful, Harry James and his orchestra.

Much fun for everybody all the way through.

CONSTANT NYMPH

(Warner Bros.)

OUT and out love stories are astonishingly rare on the screen, but "The Constant Nymph" fits most poignantly into this exclusive category.

The story of a composer, his relationship to music and to two women who love him, may appear a little dated to you in times of air raids and submarine sinkings. Yet its central theme is one that always exists, the bewilderment of a man whom two women love simultaneously and from whom he gets contrasting aspirations: one to be creative, the other to be a rich pillar of society.

Charles Boyer portrays Lewis Dodd, a moody composer who seeks escape from his own failure by visiting the Sanger family, a brood of motherless young girls being brought up in Switzerland by an intelligent if drunken father. The girls run wild, but are alive to all artistic values. Tessa, the "middle" Sanger, though little more than a child, understands and loves Lewis completely.

When Papa Sanger dies, the girls' wealthy upper class English relatives take over their upbringing, send them to a fashionable school. Thus Lewis Dodd meets Tessa's aristocratic cousin, Florence Creighton, falls instantly in love with her and marries her. The battle of woman against woman is on from that moment.

Boyer is a little too old, very literal and heavy handed as Lewis, but Joan Fontaine as Tessa and Alexis Smith as Florence, such very different types, are individually perfect. Charles Coburn as a down-to-earth Englishman, is a humorous joy to behold. You can depend upon the Fontaine performance, sensitive, sincere and tear-compelling, to be an Academy nomination next year.

THE OX-BOW INCIDENT

(20th Century-Fox)

THIS is a "Western" picture only in the fact that its scene is in the old West and the majority of the characters are cowhands. But don't expect the usual riding and shooting. The theme is a study of mob psychology and the tragic things that can happen under its spell.

The story unfolds for us through the eyes of Henry Fonda as the cowhand who comes into town and hears at the saloon that rustling has been going on thereabouts. A wild-eyed youngster bursts in with the news that Kinkaid, one of the ranchers, has been murdered. Desire for revenge is immediate, and a posse is formed to hang the culprit.

Harry Davenport, the white-haired storekeeper, pleads with the men to wait for the return of the absent sheriff, as this is a mob headed only for vengeance without legal authority. They will not listen and leave, under the leadership of Frank Conroy as Major Tetley, a power crazed veteran of the Civil War. A short way out of town the mob finds three men asleep, surrounded by cattle bearing the brand of Kinkaid's ranch. Despite the fact that the trio plead their innocence, Conroy considers the cattle sufficient evidence of their guilt. Only Fonda, Davenport, and a few others believe in their innocence, and they are the minority.

We won't tell you what happens after that, but you can be sure it will remain in your memory for a long time. This is a grim and thoughtful picture. Its characters are unforgettable; the domineering Conroy, his weak-willed son, and Dana Andrews as the leader of the men who are lynched.

It was a decidedly "different" picture, with superb direction and acting throughout.

AH, THE ROUGH, TOUGH LIFE of a COWBOY STAR

Mr. and Mrs. John Mack Brown at the entrance of their hilltop home. English architecture, yes—and inside are some rare Americana and antiques.

This lovely bedroom is known as the Washington room. Does it remind you of the last time you visited Mount Vernon?

A kiss in the clouds for some people—a kiss on top of the world for four-and-a-half-year-old Cynthia and John Mack Brown, her favorite star and daddy.

Just look at all those books on the shelves! No, you can't see half of them in this picture. The library is circular, and it holds about two thousand volumes.

A very sweet and good little girl says her prayers. John Mack Brown has attended this ritual with his children faithfully since the time they were old enough to talk.

John Mack Brown, his home and family. Just to review the facts for you—Johnny started as a football player, became an "A" picture leading man at MGM, then moved over to Universal to star as a cowboy. When Buck Jones died, Scotty Dunlap, Buck's producer, hired Johnny away from Universal to take Buck's place at Monogram.

Almost any evening after dinner you'll find the Browns like this in the living room. At the desk, that's Janie; then Cynthia sits on Pappy's lap; and Lachlan shares the paper with his mother.

This is frankly a posed picture, but we just had to show you a part of the drawing room. If only we had space to describe all of the furnishings in it! Beautiful room . . . and beautiful family, too.

Janie looks slightly bored with the general idea, but Lachy's handstand on Papa's knees has Cynthia and Mrs. Brown all agasp.

Came the war, and the servants walked out for defense. So Irene stores away all those trays that meant breakfast-in-bed.

Nowadays the stellar Mrs. Griffin plans her meals carefully with her "plain cook." She's discovered, she says, that every single day has its dinner that must be planned and prepared.

HOUSEWIFE.. starring IRENE DUNNE

by CHASE HERENDEEN

MISS IRENE DUNNE, as you very well know, is a movie star of great importance. She is that very rare movie lady who can free lance, demand and get per picture a greater sum than the President gets per year, and seldom picks herself a poor role. But she also provides with this professional life of hers, the happiest kind of private existence. She is that Hollywood exception, a star who has had only one husband, a husband to whom she has been happily wed for many years. She is, also, a devoted mother.

But right now, to her own surprise, she is also a housewife. It is the war. It is the no-servants problem. It is also a revelation to a naturally luxury-loving woman.

"It's probably a judgment on me," Miss Dunne laughed, explaining all this. "I used to say, and I honestly believed, that anyone (meaning me) could manage both a career and a home with one hand tied behind her.

"It was merely, I pointed out, a

THIS NEWEST ROLE IN WHICH IRENE FINDS HERSELF CAST

Irene doesn't just say what she wants and then sit back, however. She also checks exactly what's cooking for herself, the Doctor, and Missy. (Missy is Mary Frances, who is seven.)

Meals are now served "family style" in this busy household with no further business of things being passed by starchy maids. All three of the Griffin-Dunne menage eat together.

question of time and energy budgeting. You know, the 'nothing-to-it-just-take-seventeen-minutes-night-and-morning' sort of thing. But now that I'm having to run my own household, I will eat every one of those brave, foolish words. It took exactly one week of running my house myself to show me where the credit of my well regulated household belonged. It belonged to my capable pre-war staff. During that first dizzy week at the helm, I lost both a lot of face and a lot of weight. Five whole pounds subtracted from one hundred and fifteen are a lot of pounds."

Now this domestic reorganization of the smooth life of Irene Dunne Griffin happened all at once. She had been away on a bond tour and upon her return her entire domestic staff, who had been listening in on her stirring words, let her know how they had persuaded them. They asked Miss Dunne what she thought about their leaving en masse to help out the war effort.

What could Irene do then but say yes? So her treasured cook, butler, parlour maid, gardener, etc., etc., departed; albeit a good deal worried about how she would manage.

"One way I have managed," says Miss Dunne, "is to pack all my charming breakfast tray sets away for the duration. I have always waked up early. Now I get up early, and there's quite a difference. Everyone marvels at women plane ferriers, riveters—and of course, they are wonderful. We regard them as something quite new, these women who work. But what about women who merely, as we say, 'merely' run a house! That I submit is real work, too. My hat is off to the old-fashioned housewife who is never out of soap chips or a great big smile for that unexpected guest."

Now, Miss Dunne loves her house which, since she and her husband, Dr. Francis Griffin, built it right after a happy tour of France, turned out not the Southern Colonial mansion of Irene's girlhood dreams, but French Provincial. For it, Irene and her husband chose a spot above Hollywood in Holmby Hills. And here they installed their personal treasures collected in out-of-the-way places from Brittany to the Riviera. The rugs were all hand woven abroad, made to order to fit the floors. The foyer, the rose and turquoise drawing room, and yellow dining room—though gracious and inviting—are on the formal side; as is the French card room with its beautiful inlaid floor and exquisite game table. But the panelled library lends itself with esprit to the family's simplified war-time living.

Miss Dunne's own suite consists of a small bedroom and typically French boudoir. "I had a field day when I planned it," she says, "letting myself go as to closet space and hat and shoe compartments. I even designed a built-in bin like an overgrown honeycomb, for stockings.

"Another thing I longed for—and got—was our friendly terrace. I wanted a formal rose garden and begonia garden," (she has them both and very beautiful they are) "but I wanted the terrace to be the quintessence of informality." (It is.)

"All of this added up to the kind of a house I flattered myself, in my ignorance, that I could run in seventeen minutes daily. Then came my servant-less period to wake me up. I think it's too bad when simplified living slacks down to camping out. To avoid this, when war forced one into being sensible, I tried to evolve a system. I discovered then that one life-time habit of mine stood me in good stead—list making.

"I have always been a jotter-downer, the name of a book I wanted to read or an important concert date. So I just enlarged on the idea and bought little pads for the new 'plain' cook I hired. I have asked her to keep a daily log, with suggestions for simplifying the work, notes of needed equipment, etc. Now, when I come home from the studio, instead of being greeted verbally by the day's problems, I can at my leisure, read all about the vacuum cleaner needing a new part or that leaky faucet that needs fixing. Or I can throw the memo away!

"I've discovered that the role of housewife calls for plenty of self-discipline. For instance, I perfectly hate to think about food in the morning, especially right after breakfast. My former cook had spoiled me nicely by doing the planning and ordering. All she needed to know was whether guests were expected and how many. Of course, if her favorite film celebrities were coming, I had only to murmur their names to get the most delicious results! Now, although we entertain very little, I find that every single day has its dinner. And one can't just run one's hand across one's pompadour and dream up a whimsical menu. Because . . . yes, rationing.

"That means fancy cooking hasn't the appeal it had. Finesse has gone with those vanished egg-whites. It means no more parfaits calling for a quart of whipped cream or crepe suzettes demanding butter the size of six walnuts. Nor can I vaguely say to an eager-eyed cook, 'You think up something nice!' She enjoys a conference and deserves one.

One person who is completely happy about the new order in the Griffin-Dunne menage is Mary Frances, the seven-year-old daughter. The first morning when her mother joined her and her father at breakfast, she exclaimed, "Oh, let's always live like this!"

Mary Frances (also known as Missy) was fortunate in having an exceptionally fine Nana who was with her six years, and who, although she loved her charge dearly, never let her affection prevent her from making it clear that Daddy and Mummy came first. Thanks to wise Nana's handiwork, Mary Frances hasn't found it the least bit difficult to make the transition from nursery life to a more adult way of living. In fact, just to make sure there would be no renewal of her discarded youth, she was heard to introduce the new maid as "My mother's nurse."

Irene sometimes fails to make a point of discipline stick because Mary Frances' type of humor is so similar to her own. For instance, when table manners were about to become an issue, Missy countered with a tall tale to the effect, "Why, Mummy, at school we stand right up on our chairs and spear the bread across the table!"

Missy is a note-leaver too. Sometimes these notes are of a very personal nature and are stuck to her bathroom mirror with the earliest known stickum. One such note read, "Dear Mummy, I washed my neck."

"I found I couldn't go through with making Mary Frances practise after school," Irene confesses. "The sight of that tense little back made a spot between my shoulder blades hurt with an ache remembered from my childhood from long hours at my piano. Luckily, the Sisters at her school have been able to dovetail Mary Frances' practise hours into her school program.

"I try to hold myself in check about buying her too many clothes. It isn't easy because I love to dress her up! She's so streamlined and graceful. We think she has a swimmer's build. Perhaps I've overdone the clothes rationing because the other day my husband inquired rather wistfully whether Missy couldn't have a new coat and hat. Nevertheless, when she described a little friend's family as 'having only one car,' I decided I was on the right track.

"My daughter isn't the least impressed about my being an actress. She thinks all mothers go off to work at something. She has seen only four motion pictures in her life and didn't enjoy 'My Favorite Wife' because she said Cary Grant was mean to me."

Apropos of changing values, Miss Dunne suggests that not only children are undergoing the straightening out of values ordeal these days. She spoke of the form of snobbery in the film industry whereby prestige has been rated by salary brackets. All of which she says is pretty absurd, what with income taxes and so many top flight actors prouder than ever before in their lives of a salary of fifty dollars a month!

As for women's place in this modern world, that is something Irene Dunne knows about at first hand. Woman's place, she feels, is in Romance, whether romance arises in the home or the factory.

"One airplane plant I visited has given up employing women on the graveyard shift simply because, as the early morning hours pass, the bonds of sympathy between men and women workers become so strong. A man looks at the tired woman next to him on the assembly line and begins to long to buy her a cup of coffee. Comes the dawn. He buys it. And then on to waking up a kindly clergyman!

"And all," exclaims this sympathetic observer of her sex, "despite the perfectly hideous uniforms the women have been made to wear. They wear drab slacks or overalls. Yet what happens? The girls (and I've seen them) take a bit of string," here she demonstrated with the incomparable Dunne pantomime, "and make a neat little waistline. Then they undo a button at the throat. Or maybe two buttons and make a neat little V. V for Romance! V for Victory!!"

THE END

One of Anne's dates you've heard about is Pat Nierney. Here they are snapped at the Macamba. But one thing you haven't heard about is that Anne makes different rules for service men than she does for mere civilians. Do you know why?

The Most Dated Girl in HOLLYWOOD

By DORIS CHASE

Surprise! She's Not the Expected Glamour Girl. She's Anne Shirley, and You Can Learn About Getting and Holding Dates from Her

SHE is not the most glamorous girl in Hollywood. She is not the most beautiful.

She is not the most famous, nor the richest, nor the most intellectual . . . but this girl, Anne Shirley, is what any girl in any spot wants above anything feminine to be.

Anne Shirley is the most dated girl in town.

While hotcha glamour numbers sit home by a silent telephone, the Hollywood columns daily report where Shirley has been and with whom. And the "whom" are very scintillating.

There was John Payne, that handsome hunk of stuff, whom Anne divorced. There is Eddie Albert. There is Pat Nierney. And there are scores of others whose names you wouldn't know, but who are very handsome, nice fellows.

Now what makes Anne Shirley pack such a load of come-hither when other pretties sit at home, gnawing their best manicures?

I decided to find out, so I went and asked Anne. Just like that. Anne countered by going into a discussion on man-hunting (and man holding) strategy.

"If you want him," said Anne, meaning any man, "don't call him. I mean," she said, "if, when a girl is waiting for a call from that Dream Man whose voice or shoulders are haunting her, if—the moment she hears his voice on the phone—if, right then, she'd hang up, the chances are she'd get him."

I suggested this sounded like double-talk.

"No, no," protested our five-foot-two authority, "it's sense. When a girl finds herself drifting fast toward the nearest telephone, she should stop and ask herself two questions: (1) Do I want to see him so terribly that I'll take the risk of just seeing him once and (2) Do I want to see him so terribly that I can wait for him to call me, knowing that, if he does, Fate will be writing the beginning and not the ending of something?"

"Ah," I exclaimed, "you mean that old, old truth that men hate to be pursued?"

"Uh-huh," sighed Anne.

A moment's silence fell upon our table, perhaps in honor of various dream men lost by our lack of finesse.

"But maybe . . ." I began. Anne laughed her infectious laugh.

"I know those maybes . . . all of them! 'Maybe he hasn't called because he hasn't my number—it's unlisted' (but of course he knows people who know it) 'or because he is so busy.' One thing a girl must get through her pretty little head is a man can always find time and a way to do what he wants to do. Truly, she shouldn't call him. Just stand by with a healthy listening attitude!"

"But mightn't he want to know whether he has a chance for a date—to find out whether he made a dent the other night?"

"No," said Anne. "Why, I know a man who saw a girl at a party—didn't even get a chance to meet her—she was just leaving. He spent days trying to arrange to meet her and finally he did!"

"Where is he now?"

"I don't know that, but I got a V letter."

I tossed in a stick of dynamite. "Do you mean that any wolf with initiative and enterprise could date you?"

"Heavens, no," said Anne. "Just because a right guy will pursue—if given time—doesn't mean that every pursuing male is a right guy."

I was impressed. "Who taught you so much about men?"

"Men," said Anne.

"Do you think they know what they want in a girl?"

"I wouldn't go that far," grinned Anne, "but they know what they don't want."

"Such as . . . ?"

"Well, they don't like a girl to work at being something she's not. A girl should be herself, even when her line doesn't seem to be currently box-office. For instance, if a man starts the evening with an off-color story and she doesn't happen to enjoy that type of humor, she should let him know where he stands. I don't mean strike an attitude of outraged virtue. But she can handle the situation with a 'Sorry, I don't go in much for that sort of mirth." Far from such a policy wet-blanketing the evening, the man will probably admire the girl for (a) standing her ground and (b) objecting to needless vulgarity. He may even get a kick out of being gently told where to get off.

"And apropos of first dates, in answer to that inevitable 'What would you like to do?' a girl should have an answer ready. She should let the man know what her ideas of diversion are. Merely mumbling sweetly, 'Oh, whatever you think' doesn't make things easier for him—only harder for her. For she runs a good risk of winding up at a picture she has seen and he hasn't.

"I don't mean to sound preachy, but a girl can conserve her energy and get just as far along the road to popularity without feeling bound to be a 'good sport' on all occasions. I mean if 'live wires' are popping into the swimming pool right and left with all their clothes on and a gal feels like staying dry and comfortable, she should stay dry and comfy. Even alone. She won't be alone long because while all the dizzy aquacade girls are having to take time out to mop up their dripping tresses, the boys will drift over to that only girl sitting there waiting. And speaking of hair, if a girl has just had hers done and her date turns up all merry and Tarzanish with the top down, she needn't necessarily string along to the extent of letting two and a half dollars worth of finger-wave go to windward."

"That wouldn't be one of your worries with that cute Victory cut," I said. "How come you parted with the glamour of your long bob? Aren't men supposed to dote upon long, slinky locks?"

"I think most men dislike the conventionalized hairdo's that long hair leads to," said Anne. "It seems to me they go for a nice straight side part and well-brushed, well-kept hair. I've found that men are hipped on the subject of clean, shining hair. Maybe because they are so aware of their own. Haven't you noticed how most men can't resist running a hand over their hair passing a theater lobby mirror or a plate glass window? Of course, lots of men think they dislike short-short hair and froth a bit at our tampering with its natural color but—I wonder." Anne ran her fingers through her own three-inch curls and added in a lower tone, "Believe me, it wasn't born this way."

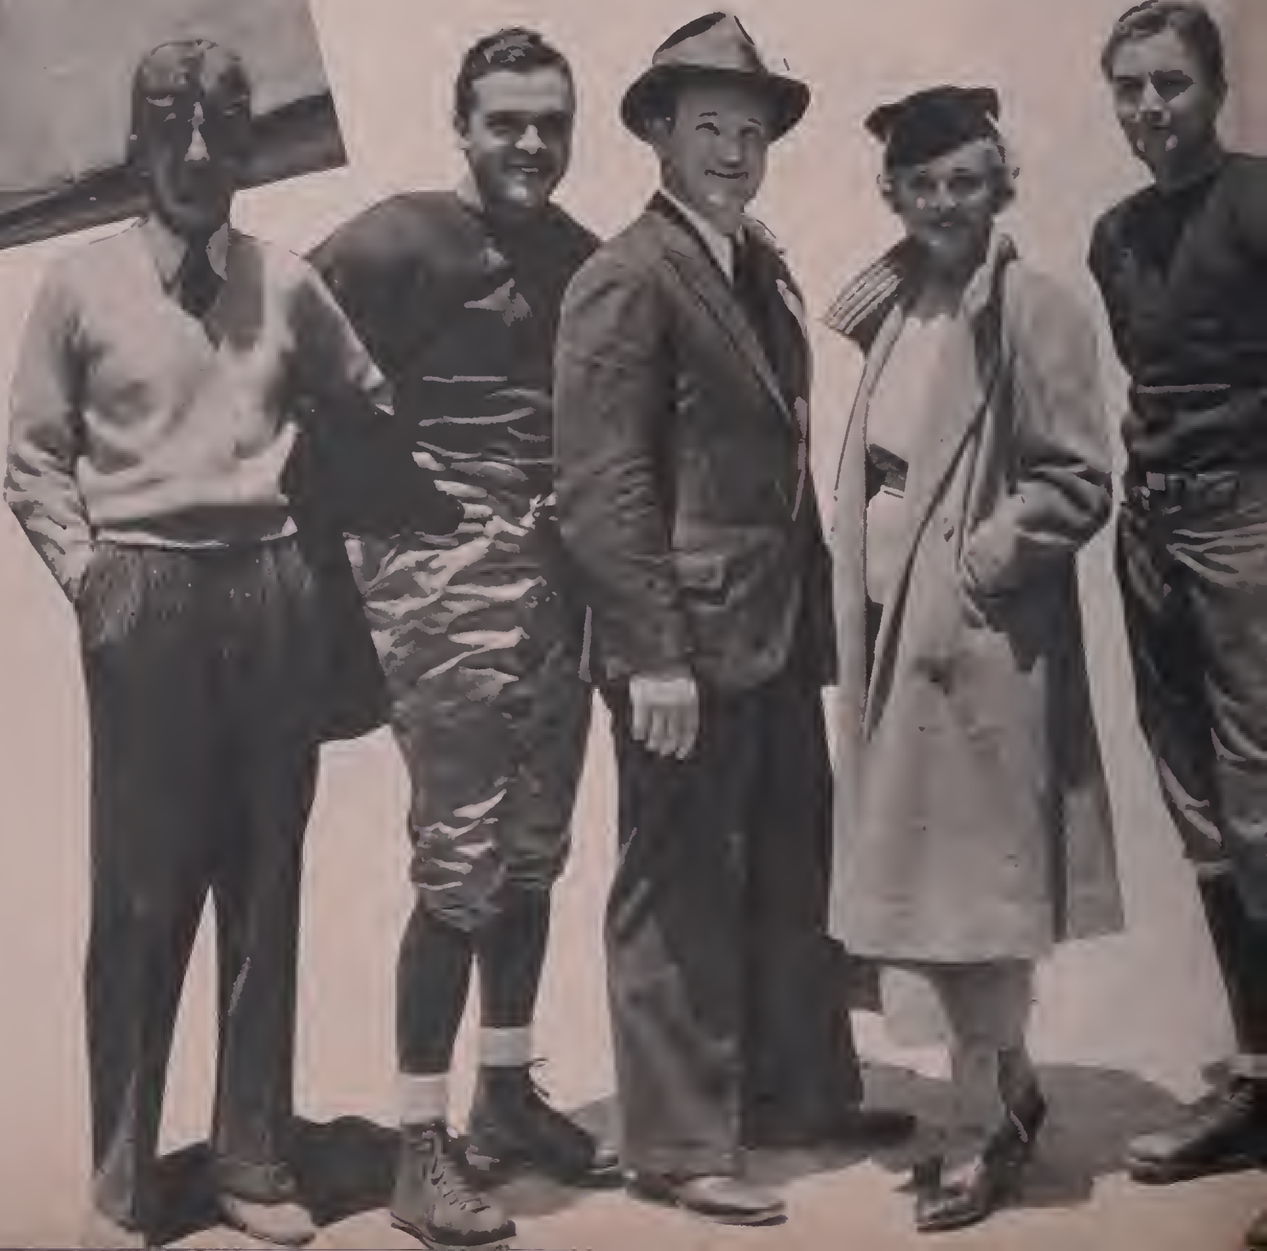
As you see here, Anne can be a good sport, just Miss Somebody, and also glamorous. By the way, have you seen her in RKO's "Bombardier"?

45 MINUTES FROM FAME

One of the best "talent scouts" yet discovered is the famed Pasadena Community Playhouse, which only forty-five minutes away from the studios, has become an incubator for fledgling stars

Gilmar Brown is the founder and director of the Playhouse. He no sooner discovers star material than Hollywood's Flesh Peddlers lure it away.

Through these portals have passed talented amateurs, later to emerge as stars. Here's Louise Albrittan, at Pasadena Players until last winter and now slated for stardom at Universal.



Here is just one group of Pasadena Playhouse discoveries. Do you recognize them?. Left to right, comedian Sterling Holloway, now in the army; Craig Reynolds, who was under contract to Warners' and is now a lieutenant in the Marine Corps under his real name, Hugh Enfield, and was recently invalided home from Guadalcanal; Joe Sauers, the bad man of many a picture; Gloria Stuart, Universal star, who went to New York for the stage and is now returning to films; Robert Young, MGM's pride and Joy; Lois January, who was in Hollywood musicals and now is an Broadway; Houseley Ormond, a character actor and Onslow Stevens.

Laird Cregar was merely Sammy Cregar at Pasadena, but he was always a fine actor.

They call him Preston Meservy at Pasadena. You call him Robert Preston. Bob's another service star.

This one should slay you. It is the one and only Mature in his first stage appearance.

At night in Pasadena he was Washington in "Valley Forge." By day he jerked gas in a filling station. Now he's Twentieth Century-Fox's own Dana Andrews.

Edgar Buchanan, that wonderful judge in "The Talk of the Town," was, only a few years ago, a Pasadena dentist, acting for the fun of it.

The play was "Montezuma." The first two knights were, right, Vic Mature, and George Reeves, who is now Claudette Colbert's leading man (and he'll soon belong to Uncle Sam).

When Florence Bates appeared in "Rebecca" Hollywood said she was an amateur, which wasn't quite true. Miss Bates had studied law in Texas, came to visit Pasadena. There she played the leading role in "Evening Star." Then Hollywood captured her.

"CLAUDIA"

That hit of the magazines, books, stage, and radio, has now made her successful way into movies. Pert-faced Dorothy McGuire, a Selznick discovery, who played the role on Broadway makes her film debut in the role of a silly young wife. Robert Young, Mr. Reliable from Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, was borrowed by Twentieth Century-Fox to play the husband. It ought to add up to a super comedy.

REMEMBER when mothers in movies were always portrayed as women of approximately fifty? Well, here's the McCoy, a real movie mother, cute Jane Wyman, wife of Lt. Ronald Reagan, mother of extra cute Maureen Reagan. Janie, next to be seen in "Princess O'Rourke," is anxious to change her screen type. Warners' have the Life of Helen Morgan all in script form. So here's Janie, made up like the famous torch singer herself. Jane wants that role, and we know that she could play it magnificently.

PORTRAIT of a very wise lady, Jean Arthur to you, Mrs. Frank Ross to Hollywood. With other stars going in for art, occupied-countries themes, war stories, Miss Arthur went in first for comedy in "The More the Merrier." Now she's going in for comedy again, but to underscore the success of it doubly, she's going in for comedy against a Western background, and has chosen no less a Western star than John (the Duke) Wayne as her co-star for "The Lady Takes a Chance," released by RKO.

With all of the necessary materials at hand, Betty Rhodes, appearing in Paramount's "Salute for Three," starts the procedure of mending a broken nail. Having already removed all of the old polish, she uses a nail brush and warm, soapy water to wash the nail and remove all traces of nail polish remover.

MOVIELAND'S Beauty PARLOR

HELLO, again!

Autumn's here. Most of your Victory Garden vegetables are harvested. But what about your hands that helped you to that result—and which probably took a beating thereby.

Any hangnails? How's your cuticle? The callouses are from the Victory Garden hoe, we suppose. But look at the chipped polish! And —oh, oh—look at that broken nail!

Keep away from those nail scissors! And you're not going to pull that nail off, either. You're going to stop right now and learn about nail salvage.

Left—The flat end of the orange stick is covered with patching glue and is forced very gently between the break. The broken nail is then pressed together until the edges adhere. Lower left—Betty tears off a small piece of tissue and covers both sides with glue. Using the orange stick, she lifts it and places it over the nail break and smooths it out. The remainder of the tissue Betty pushes under the edge of the nail with the orange stick and smooths it out to hold the break from the underneath side. Lower middle—After the glue-covered tissue is thoroughly dry, Betty applies a clear base. Lower right—After the proper drying interval for the clear base, Betty is ready for the application of her favorite shade of polish. She holds her hand steady and works from the base of the nail to the tip. Avoid having the brush too heavy with polish, she advises, and strive for an even application.

We couldn't think of anybody better to come into Movieland's Beauty Parlor to help in giving you lessons on hands . . . and fingernails, in particular . . . than Paramount's starlet, Betty Rhodes, who took time out from her work on "Salute For Three" to assist us. Frankly, we chose Betty because to us, she has a pair of the most beautiful hands in Hollywood. What's more, she knows how to use them.

Every Hollywood girl knows that hands are a definite part of beauty and personality. So you might as well wise up that way, too.

There is nothing more distressing to your friends or your particular big romance of the moment than to glance at your hands and find them mucky with neglect. Your hands are give-aways to character. They tell at a moment's glance if yours is a meticulous nature. Nine times out of ten, if your hands and nails look slovenly, that's true of the rest of your get-up. And don't think hiding them in your lap is going to help. Hands are an adjunct to expression and personality. They aid in telling a story, your story, to the world. So keep them well groomed and learn to use them gracefully.

Naturally, if you're a war worker, you won't wear your nails as long as Betty's, but whatever the length, the same rules apply.

Heaven forbid that you are a nail-biter! By now, you're old enough to know better. If you still hang on to that habit, remember that regular manicures will do much to discourage it.

Here are two important "don'ts". Don't use sharp, steel instruments to push back cuticle or to clean undersurfaces of your nails. It is too easy to break the skin and encourage infection. For the same reason, don't bite or pull at hangnails.

If you have callouses, remember that a little warm olive oil massaged into them nightly is a marvelous remedy.

Remember, too, that when cuticle is allowed to adhere to the nails, growth of the nail is retarded. Massaging the cuticle nightly with the same warm olive oil over a period of time will aid in correction. Help the process along with a bit of oil-soaked cotton on an orange stick, pushing the cuticle gently back from the nail. Above all, don't be impatient and force it. Easy does it! It's taken a long time to get that way, and it's going to take a little time to get it back to normal.

Hangnails should be lifted gently with the tip of your nippers and clipped as closely to the tissue as possible. If your cuticle is ragged and worrying you, don't attempt to use nippers or nail scissors on it yourself. See a good manicurist. More times than not, your efforts will only make matters worse.

Fingernails give away health secrets, too. If they're brittle, split, and break easily, if their color is unhealthy, it's usually a sign of internal upset. Your doctor can give you the answers.

We don't think it necessary here to go into that old standby, "How to Give Yourself a Manicure." If you haven't learned by now, you probably never will. We do want to get back to the tragedy of that broken nail and how to save it. It is worth saving.

In the accompanying photographs Betty Rhodes shows you how.

Like Betty, have your materials at hand before you begin. You'll need a bottle of polish remover; soapy, warm water and nail brush; absorbent cotton for drying. Other teeth. His accent is unequivocally French. Hers is inescapably Spanish. He is slim, blue-eyed, and blondish in the manner of a Boulevardier. She is sloe-eyed, dark-haired, vivid, brittle as the click of castanets.

Below—And here Betty Rhodes proves conclusively that it's well worth the effort to patch your broken nails.

Romance in the Grand Manner

We introduce the characters, to wit, the girl: Maria Montez.

The man: Jean Pierre Aumont.

The innocent but fascinated onlooker: this writer.

The theme of the story: love.

This must be true love because it doesn't run smoothly. The pair is arguing somewhat heatedly over an important technical point. "My vocabUlary," (accent placed exotically on the third syllable instead of the conventional second), "is excellent. I know all English words that I know Spanish words," is the announcement of Maria.

Pierre beams upon her. "But," he adds gently, "sometimes, your accent, it is in the wrrrrong place."

Maria is willing to concede this point. "A writer that I know, she make me veree happy becose she said in her story that I must be born in Brooklyn becose I have aaboslUTely no oxcent!"

Pierre finds this delicious. "Remember the trouble," he reminds her, "you had with the name of Nijinsky's celebrated dance?" The two of them go off into gales of mirth. It seems that Maria, in an energetic attempt to translate "La Spectre d'une Rose" announced that it was "A Ghost of a Rose." Which is okay, except that Americans do not usually pronounce "ghost" to rhyme with "frost."

This introduction should bring home one point to you: that one of the merriest, maddest loves is that between the Leetle girl from the Canary Islands, and the sophisticate from Paris.

Maria still remembers the first time she ever saw Pierre Aumont: it was in a French motion picture, seen in the Canary Islands when she was a sub-deb. Her father was Spanish consul to the Islands, which explains her presence in this exotic locale.

The picture was "Hotel du Nord," starring Annabella. Pierre enacted the role of the young lover who made a suicide pact with Annabella, shot her and ran away without fulfilling his part of the grim bargain. Maria enjoyed the picture extravagantly.

Somewhat later, after Maria had married and moved to Belfast, she attended a house party in London and saw another Aumont picture. Lord Louis Mountbatten, now head of the celebrated Commandos, was among the audience that night. When years later and after said first marriage had been abrogated, Maria told this story to Pierre, he brightened perceptibly. "What did Lord Mountbatten say about me?" he wanted to know.

Maria dimpled at him, her eyes sparkling with deviltry. "He thought you were good," she admitted, sparing the adjectives so as not to spoil the man.

The third time Maria saw Pierre—this time, the first time in the flesh—it was at a party in Hollywood. They chatted briefly, very briefly. Maria now confesses impishly, "That night, Jean Pierre, you failed to sparkle. You struck me as being uninteresting. You were, I hate to say it, my sweet, without color."

So assaulted, Jean Pierre resorted

We're in Love" seems set for a popularity run. It's a haunting thing from the excellent score of the Broadway success, "Oklahoma" . . . Gene de Paul and Don Ray have turned out some swell things for the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer super-duper "Broadway Rhythm," the cutest of which are "Solid Potato Salad" and "Milk Man, Keep Those Bottles Quiet" . . .

JAM NOTES:

Frank Sinatra's first picture on his new R.K.O. contract will be "Higher and Higher" and he co-stars with Michele Morgan . . . Kay Thompson has been signed by Metro as vocal coach and arranger. Before his untimely death in an airplane accident, Ralph Rainger composed a song called "Lucky Cowboy" which is considered by some who have heard it to be his best. Paramount Pictures, where Rainger spent many years writing hit songs for their musicals, is paying him tribute by dedicating a musical short to him, and the title of it is "Lucky Cowboy" . . . Warners are starring Ann Sheridan in "Shine on Harvest Moon," the story of the life of Nora Bayes. It will be a big musical and Annie will sing all the famous old songs that Nora Bayes made popular.

The next band to hit the big time will be Eddie Miller's. Eddie himself needs no introduction to swing fans because he has long been rated the best tenor saxophone man in the music business, having been named all-time All-American by no less an authority than Paul Whiteman. He was the spark of the old Bob Crosby band and many of his musicians were also in that outfit. With musicianship dispensed by such top-notchers as Nick Fatool, Nappy Lamare, Matty Matlock, Floyd O'Brien, Doc Rando and Clyde Rogers, Eddie can't miss. The band has been drawing large crowds to the Hollywood Palladium on Monday nights, broadcasting over C.B.S., and was featured in Universal's click musical, "Mr. Big" . . . Listen for colored singer Dolores Williams. She is the girl who has been packing them in at the Trocadero in Hollywood, and the first night club attraction since Lena Horne who can make blase Hollywoodites sit silently in rapture at her singing. The studios will get her before long . . . Stan Kenton's band opened big at the Palladium, and the rumor was hot that he would be on the Bob Hope show in the fall . . . "In My Arms," the gayest of the war songs, has been purchased by Metro - Goldwyn-Mayer for their picture version of "See Here, Private Hargrove." The writers of the song cooperated with the Office of War Information on the paper conservation program when they published their tune. Instead of having a picture in color on the cover of the sheet music, as is usually done, they had a little squib saying "Paper Shortage Getting Worse—Here Is Where We Start the Verse" and then proceeded to start the music right on the cover page. Many publishers are following suit now, because it saves space, dyes, etc. . . . When Harry James was ill for three days during his New York Paramount Theater engagement, Frank Sinatra pitched in and took over for him, refusing to accept any salary from Harry. So Harry presented him with a thousand dollar bond, which he had to take. After all, it isn't patriotic to return them . . .

to mankind's unfailing weapon. "I remember you clearly. I was horrified by your . . . er . . . hat, if one could name it that. It was feathers . . ." he indicated half a frame with a sweeping gesture . . . "over one eye. And feathers . . ." he completed the circle by drawing a forefinger under his chin . . . "beneath your face. The feathers I could not forget."

With feathers on his mind—a habit of all gay birds—M. Aumont went to New York. And there, by odd coincidence, also went Senorita Montez. They met one night at "21." It was, mirabile dictu, the 13th of the month, Pierre's fatal date. Maria happened to be crossing the foyer when she noticed her girlhood movie idol, looking somewhat more scintillant than he had at the recent Hollywood party. She walked directly to him, spoke, and asked him to light her cigarette, please.

"Will you do me the favor of having dinner with me tomorrow night?" he asked before the match was extinguished.

"I speak no French; you speak no Spanish, yes? Then I think each of us will be good for the other. We shall improve our English together," was Maria's way of saying yes.

They dined. They conversed. They made a date for the next day and the day after that and after that. So successful was this new method of learning English that in no time they had learned to say "I love you." Of course, the verb "to love" is the first taught in any language. Know why? Because love is the easiest of all lessons to learn, and the most difficult to forget.

At the end of two weeks, Maria was called back to her studio, so Pierre decided that it would be absurd for him to remain in the yawning loneliness of that desert, New York. He made reservations on Maria's train. There is no place like a train for the enhancing of love; there is also no place like a train for the holding of an informal, day-long quiz program.

Maria and Pierre developed a game entitled "Capitals." Maria secured, at one of the stops, an atlas on which were marked the capitals of each country in the world.

"I will bet fifty cents, Pierre, that you do not know the capital of Korea," Maria said.

"That must be Keijo," Pierre said.

Maria glowed. "That," she stated, "almost everyone knows. Here is the fifty cents. The next will not be so easy. I will bet twenty-five cents that you do not know the capital of Surinam."

Pierre's eyes brightened. "Paramaribo," he said. Somewhat apologetically, upon noticing the straight line of Maria's mouth, he added, "I was there once."

"You travel too much," observed Maria, not without a certain bitterness. "Do you know the capital of Honduras for ten cents?"

Triumph had a way with the corners of Pierre's mouth. "That would be Tegucigalpa." Maria threw the atlas at him.

By the time they had reached St. Louis, Pierre's computation on the back of an envelope informed him that his geographic savvy had netted him seven dollars and fifty cents. Proving, with true French acumen, that intellect should always run tributary to the senses, he sank the seven-fifty in a bottle of "Moment Supreme" for Maria. She began to take a more charitable view of the world and its divers localities.

It was probably around Kansas City that Maria asked, from the depths of a magazine she had been reading upside down, "Pierre, what did you first notice about me?"

Pierre applied a censorable look to

LETTERS FROM OUR BOYS IN THE SERVICE . . . . . .

$10.00 LETTER

Many people—strangely most of them are civilians—are prone to underestimate the importance of training camp barnstorming tours by screen stars of the male species.

Those, who are not downright critical and not clamoring for a shotgun induction or a lynching from the nearest tree, challenge the value of these visits on psychological grounds. Appearance of screen celebrities earning fabulous salaries, they maintain, rankles the soldier in uniform rather than entertains him.

In the interests of serving the truth, I would like to tell you about the reaction of this training camp to a visiting movie star whose face and antics have been familiar to military posts the length and breadth of the nation. I refer to Bob Hope.

When the announcement came that he was coming to Camp Wheeler, it broke as big news. It was the lead story on page one of the camp newspaper. The local daily newspaper played it up on page one. In the ranks, the men spoke of Hope's scheduled show with the awe and enthusiasm with which you might expect them to greet the unconditional surrender of the enemy.

Soldiers are indifferent to these personal appearances. A strange indifference that finds a camp obliged to issue two tickets to a platoon to be certain that seats are distributed without discrimination in as representative form as possible. A strange indifference which finds soldiers fighting for these tickets—free, of course. A strange indifference which forces Hope to repeat the show after the broadcast for those who were unable to obtain seats during the first performance.

Laughs were reverberating all over the camp hours afterwards. His jokes were repeated at hikes days later. He unquestionably gave a shot in the arm to morale.

I am more than happy to have this opportunity to express to you Americans what we English boys think of you all.

Naturally, this being an R.A.F. station, we have no movie personalities stationed here, but I spent one of the most enjoyable furloughs I have ever had in Hollywood.

Until then I had often wondered what you Americans were really like. I can assure you, I shall go back to England with nothing but the very highest praise for the swellest people I ever hope to meet.

I was treated as a king. I was privileged to meet such stars as Betty Grable, Hedy Lamarr, Carmen Miranda, Tyrone Power, Joe E. Brown, Irene Dunne, Cesar Romero, George Montgomery, Jane Darwell, Trudy Marshall, Cary Grant, Marlene Dietrich, and many others. I had the greatest thrill of my life talking to them. They treated me in really American style, and only those who have visited the States can appreciate what a grand style that is.

Hollywood movie stars, the citizens of Los Angeles and indeed ALL Americans, you gave me such a wonderful reception it will live in my memory forever. You made me happy. I have never met such kind and friendly people. You certainly have left no stone unturned "to serve the services."

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the actors and actresses in Hollywood for the work they are doing. Kay Kyser, Bob Hope, Red Skelton, Jack Benny, Humphrey Bogart and many others. They are everywhere to welcome us and make us at home.

I would also like to take a minute to take my hat off to Clark Gable, Bob Montgomery, Henry Fonda, Alan Ladd and many men who are in the service and a fine bunch of fellows. To Hollywood I say they are doing more than their part in this war.

Will You Try at No Risk This Easy
DOUBLE VITAMIN Way
To Bring Back Natural Color to Your GRAY or GRAYING HAIR?

HERE is WAY to TEST FINDINGS of MODERN SCIENCE No fuss or bother. Whether your hair is just starting to turn gray, or is now gray, Gold Medal Double Vitamin Action offers new hope for millions. Actually, science, in tests featured recently in a leading publication, brought never-before-realized evidence to light of what vitamins may do to restore gray hair to natural color if due to vitamin deficiency.

GRAY HAIR is a HANDICAP. Here is where Gold Medal Double Vitamins step into the picture—the healthful food supplement, giving your system the much needed vitamins that may be lacking and if so, may feed natural color into graying, faded hair, giving it new fresh beauty.

NOT A HAIR DYE. No interference with permanents. Non-fattening. And, of course, there's no harm. The natural color of your hair—black, brown, auburn, or blonde—may be brought back this simple way. Why not look younger? Why not maintain that air of poise and vitality that comes with an attractive appearance? Why risk losing charm and appeal? Why take these chances when vitamin deficiency may be responsible?

MODERN SCIENTIFIC TESTS. Tests reported by a national magazine on small groups of gray haired men and women, ages ranging from 21 to 60, while too recent for conclusive evidence, have revealed remarkable results. Given fairly large doses of certain vitamins daily, 88% of them showed first signs of results in from one to six months. Age had no bearing. The earliest results occurred in a man of 50 whose hair started turning from gray to natural black in only one month; the latest in a girl of 23 whose results came in six months. In previous tests on animals, when they were not fed these vitamins daily, their hair turned white. But when they were fed adequate amounts of these vitamins, their hair became natural in color again.

the lady. He said, "I liked the way you walk. You are very graceful; you have about you the sway of a willow in the wind."

By the time they had reached Albuquerque, Pierre's acquaintanceship with the world had won him a little more cash, so he decided to invest it in the typical sterling silver and turquoise jewelry available at the Indian House. Maria, suspecting some such enterprise, caught him just in time. She had never seen Indian work before, so it seemed a trifle too primitive. "No, you must not buy a thing for me," she cautioned Pierre. "If you do, for sentiment's sake I will have to wear it forever, and that I could not bear."

From Albuquerque to Los Angeles, Pierre might have been discovered, in lone moments, constructing designs on miscellaneous bits of paper. He had a beautiful idea for a ring. Maria had told him, "I want to be engaged formally, with a ring and everything. I want it to say in the papers, Miss Maria Montez is engaged to M. Pierre Aumont. It should be properly formal."

The completed ring, designed by Pierre, looks like half an emerald world, set in a wide gold frame across which lies a ribbon of diamonds. Having been so successful with this invention, Pierre whipped up another little number: a lapel pin done in gold and jade. The gold forms a miniature flower pot from which spring golden stems on which grow cactus pads of jade. Thus far, no one has been able to extract from either Pierre or Maria the esoteric meaning of said cactus plant.

No love affair as profound as this ever progresses without fireworks. One evening Maria and Pierre were invited to be dinner guests at the home of a mutual friend. The night before, they quarreled. They exchanged hot words in even hotter French-Spanish—some of which, luckily, neither understood. They decided never to see one another again. So, the following morning, Pierre telephoned the hostess and explained that Maria would be unable to be present that night because she was "out of town" on studio business. However, he promised that he would be a guest.

At approximately the same moment, Maria was consulting her astrologer. Yes indeed, she had a personal astrologer who appears to be fantastically accurate. Having scanned his charts, he scolded Maria. He said that her horoscope indicated that she was in no mood to alter the course of her entire life at that time. Pierre, the stars said, was an ideal mate, so what was her big idea "flying in the very face of Venus. Don't be a silly little girl," counseled the star specialist. "By all means, go to the party."

So Maria telephoned her hostess to say that she would be present, but surely, that evening. "But," gasped the bewildered hostess, "Pierre just rang me up to say you were out of town."

"You know picture business," chirped the resourceful Maria, "one minute you are out of town. The next you are not out of town. No one is to blame."

The result was, of course, that they met at the party, rushed to one another's arms, and you now know with what happy results. Pierre, incidentally, sets small store by any astrologer, however certified. Having fought for France, having escaped after the French Armistice was signed, having built a new career in this country in order to have some money to support his family when he rejoins the Free French, Pierre is inclined to believe in personal initiative as opposed to relying on phophecy.

Even his love for Maria is not great enough to swerve him from what he feels is his duty to his free countrymen. As soon as all the necessary retakes for "The Cross of Lorraine" are finished, Pierre will report to General Charles de Gaulle in London. Maria, with "The Cobra Woman" and "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves" safely caught on celluloid, hopes for permission to do an entertainment tour in England and thus be near Pierre for a little while at least.

Meanwhile, until Pierre sails, the Aumonts are like millions of other newlyweds—counting the hours till the war parts them, counting the weeks till peace restores them forever to one another.

COLT COMRADES

Hopalong Cassidy and his pals invest their money in a ranch and decide to settle down and lead a peaceful life. This rosy dream vanishes when Hoppy discovers that the guy who sold them the ranch controls the water supply of all the ranchers in the valley. This villainous landlord, Jebb Hardin, cuts off the water so that the cattle die and the ranchers can't pay off their mortgages.

Hoppy wants to straighten the matter out, but Hardin frames him as a rustler and "proves" it to the other ranchers. With a price on his head, Hoppy is forced to hide out in the hills, but he manages to get incriminating evidence against Hardin. Interwoven is plenty of ridin' and shootin' and several chuckles afforded by Andy Clyde as "California."

HERS TO HOLD

They really should do better by our Deanna. As a romantic comedy with songs, "Hers to Hold" is okay—but it should be more than that, if it is meant to be an adequate vehicle for one of the brightest talents in movies. Even with the added talents of Joseph Cotten as the man in Deanna's heart, the film can't quite hold its place in the first rank.

Story trouble, of course. It's that oldie about a very rich girl and a fresh guy, in this case a flyer temporarily on leave, and how the girl loves him adoringly despite his not being the marrying type.

Deanna is Penelope Craig, a spoiled heiress until she meets Bill Morley at a Red Cross Blood Bank. She is just another smooth conquest to him and when, in order to see him, she takes a riveting job at an aircraft plant, he's more irked than intrigued. The more Bill tries to shake her, the more she clings until finally patriotism gets both of them.

Deanna, in wonderful voice, sings several numbers, the standout of which is "Say a Prayer for the Boys Over There."

So she hunted out the man who farmed the property three decades ago and hired him as a tenant farmer. Through him she got some hired if rather aged farmhands. Then she proceeded to put about seventeen acres under cultivation. There will be more. But it takes time. The rest of her land is heavily timbered.

Crops to date consist of potatoes, corn, strawberries, raspberries and feed for the livestock. Eggs are the major source of revenue, however. One thousand flourishing Rhode Island Red chickens now dwell at Camp Hill. Paulette started with five hundred chicks. She ordered them by mail, and she also ordered the construction of a hen house. That was on one of her periodic trips to the scene of operations. Mostly Paulette farms by long distance, on account of she still works in pictures, too. Before the poultry was delivered—also by mail—she had to rush back to Hollywood for another opus. The star tells the rest of that particular story with true dramatic emphasis.

"I got a frantic wire from Constance," she explains. "The chicks had arrived. The hen house wasn't finished and what on earth was she to do with them? She positively refused to sleep with them herself. Well, there was the guest house. Why not? They seemed to me mighty important guests. I told Constance to bed them there.

"Those chickens had a beautiful start in life. They lived in my guest house for two weeks."

Constance, it should be explained, is Constance Collier, grande dame of the theater. She and Paulette are close friends. They worked together for a time as coach and pupil respectively. They still do, whenever Paulette does radio shows emanating from New York. Miss Collier makes her home on the farm. But the idea of her acting as coach to five hundred baby chickens, is whimsical, to say the least.

Having established the productivity, we come now to the marketing. Paulette is as advanced as tomorrow's headlines. She believes in barter.

"I began by trading a dump truck for a cow," she announces proudly. "Then I dickered with the grocery store, the meat market, and the gas station in Suffern. They all agreed to exchange their goods for my farm stuff. In other words, we get the things we need and can't grow or produce for the things we can, without any financial transaction involved."

It is shrewd Yankee trading on both sides, you can bet. And that isn't all. There is much, much more. Paulette went farther afield. She got a wholesale grocery house in New York City to harvest as well as buy her potatoes, after she found out the big city was begging for potatoes. Again she took credit for future supplies rather than money.

There is in New York a restaurant consistently patronized by celebrities called "21 Club." As a matter of fact "21" seeks the celebrities as much as the celebrities seek "21." Nobodies aren't cordially received. Unless the doorman recognizes you, you're apt to get a cold and fishy eye. It would be that place of all places that Paulette tied up on a barter deal. They've agreed to take all the eggs she can spare, or corn, or anything she may decide to raise in exchange for her entertainment bills there and supplying her with theater tickets.

Another Goddard farm item is

worth mentioning. When winter blankets Camp Hill acres with white, under which the seeds of future profit sleep, Paulette's tenant farmer plans to round up neighbors, who are glad for piece work, and cut the timber. There are enough trees to last a long time with discriminate logging—enough to keep on paying the taxes. Remember the silverware introduced earlier? Oh yes, that was acquired by barter too. Paulette took it in payment for her talents on a radio show.

The girl is wonderful. The former owner, Burgess Meredith, calls her "Enterprise, Inc." He gave her a painting of the house for Christmas and for a while there was a comedy of errors about that. He intended to surprise her with the gift, naturally. Paulette was in California. Burgess arranged to have Waldo Pierce, a foremost American artist and a next-door neighbor at Camp Hill, do the painting.

So far, so good. But came to Hollywood another of those wires from Constance! "The outside of the house is being painted." Upon receiving it, Paulette hit the ceiling. She'd had the house painted in the summer. Calling Constance by long distance telephone, she gave orders that such extravagant foolishness be stopped. Always vague, Constance remained vague on this occasion. She neglected to explain that only one lone painter was sitting on a camp stool some distance away from the front stoop, putting marks on canvas.

Waldo Pierce, foremost American artist, was kicked off the premises. Burgess had to reveal the truth to Paulette after he had soothed Pierce's ruffled feelings. Even so, when the finished painting, a lovely study of the front view of Camp Hill House with bare, wintry trees in the background and snow covering the foreground lawn, was delivered, a note from the artist was attached. It read: "I practically froze to death before I got the boot and nobody even offered me a cup of coffee!"

Of course, the Goddard acumen is not all limited to soil tilling these days. She's doing right well with her screen career. Capturing the only comedy role among the three starring parts in "So Proudly We Hail," Paramount's film story of heroic nurses on Bataan, she played it to the hilt. Reward was quick. She now has a juicy plum as co-star with Fred MacMurray in a farce comedy about life in densely crowded Washington called "Standing Room Only." After it will come a Mark Sandrich production written especially for her and Sonny Tufts, the exciting newcomer who was her romantic team-mate in "So Proudly." Most of the picture will be filmed in San Francisco.

Just prior to these engagements, word was bruited around Hollywood as how La Goddard was getting a slight run-around. She seemed to be stuck with pictures nobody else wanted. Those who knew her propensity for getting whatever she wants wondered why she took them. Finally the rumors reached Paulette herself. Her own explanation is admirable. "I wasn't ready for the better ones," says she.

Her West Coast home is a five-room bungalow up Coldwater Canyon in Beverly Hills. It is attractive, but not pretentious. Right now Paulette and her mother are doing their own housework.

The house leans into a hillside. Recently Paulette decided to pave the lower garden terrace with bricks. Accordingly she bought a sizable load and looked around for brick layers. The only ones she could find were a couple of kids in the Penrod stage. They spent most of their time on the job building temporary forts. They devoted only odd moments to laying bricks. The pattern they chose for paving was strictly from indolence. What there was of it looked gosh awful by the time their employer came to the conclusion that the whole project was a mistake.

Now the average Hollywood citizen in the same spot would have licked his wounds and remained saddled with a mess of unwanted bricks. Paulette called up the studio and asked whether they could contact a contractor in the market for bricks. It was a cinch. There happens to be a current brick shortage. She unloaded.

All this threatens to make her sound too darned efficient for walking with ordinary mortals. Well, there have been occasions . . . The business of the spare tire for her midget automobile, for instance.

Paulette owns an English Crosley. She had it shipped back to the farm because it will go an unbelievable number of miles per gallon of gas which, as everybody knows, is scarcer than teeth on her hens in the East. The last time she was there, she drove it into the village of Suffern one night to go to the movies. When she parked her car, she remembered there was no way of locking the spare tire. Miss Enterprise, Inc., knows all about the danger of tire theft in these troublous days. She wasn't going to be robbed. No sir. She carried the spare into the theater over her arm and deposited it under the seat for safe keeping. Only, when the show was over, she forgot her precious possession and walked out with nothing over her arm. The tire has neither been seen nor heard from since.

Then there was the time she undertook to weed the front lawn of her farmhouse. It was the day before she left for Hollywood to begin "Standing Room Only." Clad in shorts and innocent of garden gloves, she pulled up parasites with determination and righteous indignation. Presently two small boys strolled down the road, paused to watch her curiously. They paused so long she asked them why didn't they come in and help her instead of just standing there.

"Oh, no ma'am," spoke up the larger of the two. "We couldn't do that. We catch poison ivy if we touch it with our bare hands."

Paulette, who had been blissfully unaware of the nature of her weeds, "catches" it too. She came down with a spectacular case on the train back to Hollywood.

HOW TO FALL ASLEEP

Jeanette MacDonald tells me that her recent comment in Movieland on insomnia, "I defy anyone to mention a cure I have not tried," has provoked an avalanche of sleep aids in her mail. One woman wrote, "Do at least ten somersaults back, and ten forward; soon you'll tire and fall asleep."

A fan from Wisconsin advised Jeanette thusly: "Before you retire at night have two pails of water beside the bed—one hot, the other cold. Put one foot in the cold and one in the hot water for five minutes, then alternate feet and water until sleep comes."

"What worries me on those," says Jeanette, "is that sleep might catch up with me when I'm in the middle of a somersault—or still dangling my feet in the buckets."

GOING TO GET MARRIED SOON?

Movieland always tries to give you the news before it happens so that you will feel that you are part of our Hollywood chatter circle.

The over-the-back-fence gossip is that Lynn Bari has purchased a charming bungalow from George Montgomery, who has just reported to the Army. The gossips say that Lynn purchased the house for a honeymoon cottage for herself and test pilot Sid Luft.

The truth is that Lynn's divorce from agent Walter Kane will not be final until next November, but Sid is helping her with the decorating of the new home, and there is one bedroom as yet unfurnished that Lynn says won't be completed until next November.

Perhaps you can put two and two together like the rest of movieland and get that answer to that with ringing bells.

PARENTS PROTEST HOPE'S PICTURES

Children are the cause of more revisions in motion picture scripts than most any other factor. Western motion picture makers have realized this for years, but few producers of major motion pictures have ever taken it into consideration. Amazing as it may be, Bob Hope, that delightful zany, is the first to take it really seriously. Reason is that irate parents have been burdening his mail carrier with countless letters protesting his "bad influence" on their children.

In a recent picture, Hope was pictured drinking coffee from a cup from which a spoon had not been removed. At the point where the spoon kept hitting Bob's eyeball, he carefully took the spoon, bent it in half, and replaced it in the cup. Gleefully, the younger generation started bending spoons. One bellicose father went so far as to send a bill for three bent spoons to Hope. Now, in "Let's Face it," Hope has convinced his bosses that material of this sort has got to be eliminated. Result: The script was rewritten in part, and you'll see a model Bob Hope on the screen.

MARGO AND GOOD NEIGHBORS

Margo, back in Hollywood after New York and Washington, D. C., where she has been working with the Committee on Inter-American Affairs, has been attempting to convince anyone who will listen (and most especially motion-picture makers) that the truth should be told about her beloved Mexico and South America.

On the set of "The Leopard Man" where she is working, she told about one producer who said he was in complete agreement with her attitude.

"Then," said Margo, "he told me of plans for a picture on Mexico. 'I want to show the United States some of the romance of our neighbor,' he said very gently. 'Some of the things I saw like the peasants in their colorful white nightshirts with loads of sticks and wood on their backs!'"

"That," admitted Margo, "is Hollywood's attitude. In the first place the peasants don't wear nightshirts—that's their way of dressing. And in the second place, what's so romantic about a man with a load on his back?"

Margo has been working closely with Vice-President Wallace on his work for betterment of international relations with our southern neighbors and will probably return East for a radio program which has his blessing.

THE SOUND OF HIS VOICE

One of the great Damon-and-Pythias friendships of our time is the one between Jose Iturbi, the concert pianist, and Mortimer Snerd. Iturbi met Mortimer at a recent show given by Edgar Bergen for the army quartermaster corps. The pianist was so fascinated by Mortimer's somewhat shuffled features, he could scarcely drag his eyes away from the dummy during the performance. Now Iturbi calls Bergen frequently so he can hear Mortimer's voice.

Guy Kibbee was lecturing his son, Guy Junior, on saving money.

"Remember son," said Guy, "as you grow older you will discover that money talks."

Said Junior, "All mine says is 'so long.'"

Ida Lupino, who made such a to-do about going natural a couple of years ago—from blonde to her own brunette hair, from penciled eye-brows to her own high arched ones—has had another change of heart; or of personality.

Ida's become a red-head, cut her hair short, and calls her new titian bob, "my military rare-cut." She wears it up with a Gibson girl swirl and velvet bow a-top, and says it's her own subtle strategy to induce Jack Warner to assign her a dramatic love story for her next vehicle.

Ida is determined to bury the wharf wenches and neurotics for a spell. Well, it worked before. The little Lupino got her first dramatic role in "The Light That Failed" by looking the part intensely.

BEAUTY IN A BATHING SUIT

The handsome Richard Derr is the heartthrob of many of the younger film players and the constant beau of Anne Baxter.

During the shooting of "North Star," Anne gained weight until she was a real problem for the cameramen. It came to Derr's attention. He took Anne to the beach one Sunday for a swim. They walked the length of the whole Santa Monica Beach colony with Dick keeping silent. Finally Anne asked him what was the matter. Dick admitted it was because he thought her less beautiful in a bathing suit. Anne went on a diet pronto and now once again is her pretty self.

Nobody around town would be surprised if these two marched to the altar before Dick reports for service.

This is a real re-union! Tim Holt—who now prefers to be known as Lt. Charles Holt, which is his real name—and his wife at the Players'. Once the Holts were actually separated; now they are reunited in marriage but separated by war, between leaves, of course.

At the same time that brother Tim and his wife were out dancing, sister Jennifer was celebrating with her romantic flame, Dennis Day of Jack Benny's radio program.

GOOD FELLOW—TYRONE POWER

When Ty Power left Twentieth Century-Fox for the Marine Corps, he was presented with the keys to his private dressing room, and was told no one would be allowed in it until he came back to claim it. Ty had used his dressing room on the lot as his office also, and it was filled with all his private papers.

When Joan Fontaine reported to Twentieth for "Jane Eyre," she was assigned to the beautiful dressing room of Sonja Henie. Right then Miss Henie came back and raised not too charming what-have-you about this situation. It was most embarrassing to the studio to have to ask Miss Fontaine to move, but they had no choice, and no equally fine suite to move her to.

Mr. Power, then at the Marine Base in San Diego, heard about the rumpus and sent the keys to his Annabella, who in turn personally presented them to Miss Fontaine, thus avoiding a very embarrassing tizzy all around. Give credit to Miss Fontaine—she didn't demand either dressing room, and would cheerfully have moved into any little hole.

It was just Ty's way of cooperating with his studio, although he is no longer there.

AND THAT IS GRATITUDE!

Handsome, hospitable John Mack Brown played "sucker" this month to a guy with a Southern accent who arrived on Johnny's Bel Air doorstep with the story that he was from the actor's home town in Alabama, and would he loan him some money until "Tuesday."

Johnny wrote him a check, and the "grateful guy" forged four of them, besides cashing the original, within four days!

CUT OUT THAT SWIMMING!

There is a price to every girl who wins stardom. The wackiest one is that now being paid by Esther Williams. Even though she was a swimming champion, Esther loves to swim for the mere fun of it.

When she made a hit in her first picture at MGM, they began at once to groom her for real stardom. Willingly Esther did everything they told her, but thought her regular thirty-minute swim in the morning would help keep her figure in the measurements to the studio's liking.

Imagine her surprise when she received a personal note from one of the studio heads requesting her to give up so much swimming. It seems that swimming develops just the muscles that they think won't do on the screen. So little Esther is beached and becomes one of the regular movie stars who pose in bathing suits but don't go near the water.

BITS ABOUT LUPE

There is one really giddy person in movieland. That is the unpredictable Lupe Velez. First she stole Erich Remarque away from Marlene Dietrich. Now her best beau is top Mexican star, Arthur de Cordova.

That Lupe! She fights and fights, and poor Mr. Cordova doesn't know whether he has a girl or not. Only after many overtures do they make up and generally clasped in his right hand Mr. Cordova will have a pair of diamond earrings as a making-up present.

Lupe is going to be a lady producer in Mexico City. It is quite fashionable in movieland at this time to take an interest in pictures being made below the border. Lupe will be the first lady producer, and we'll bet she'll be the one who gets the most done.

LOVELY IS THE WORD FOR NORMA

Miss Norma Shearer walked into her favorite hat shop in Beverly Hills the other day. She was seated in a fitting room partitioned off from the rest of the shop. As she was sitting there she heard a voice from the next room saying, "I want to look as lovely as Norma Shearer did when she played 'Juliet.'"

What woman could resist peeking? Miss Shearer couldn't, and discovered in the next booth Jeanette MacDonald fitting Juliet caps for her costumes when she makes her debut at the Metropolitan Opera House. Norma sat and supervised the fittings from there on.

LOST—SEVERAL POUNDS

Pat O'Brien looks so much more attractive since he lost all that weight that he'll portray Major Cavanagh in "The Iron Major" at RKO just eight years younger than was originally planned in the script.

"Now," says Pat, "if I can just wear that checkered golf cap I bought eight years ago, without Eloise screaming!"

QUIP BY POWELL

Bill Powell is so famous for his quick wit that I'll just have to let you have this one.

On the set of his picture, "The Heavenly Body," a troupe of Russian dancers had been practicing their routine for hours. Several minor casualties had occurred. One girl had sprained her ankle. Another had fallen and hit her head. A boy had twisted his wrist. And still another had cut his hand on the saber which hung at his side.

"This picture," said Bill, sitting on the sidelines, "should be known as 'The Heavenly Body—with an all-plaster cast.'"

This looks like Mickey's most serious dating since Ava. She's Mary Elliot.

Movieland Beauty Parlor

important accessories are an orange stick; and bottles of clear base, colored polish, and sealer. And the instruments of salvage; a piece of medium-weight tissue paper and any kind of water-resistant glue of medium consistency. The Hollywood gals go for airplane glue, that you can buy in any dime store.

The first photograph shows you Betty's nail ready for the washing procedure. Before reaching this stage, there is one important step; remove all of the old polish from the damaged nail.

Now, as Betty shows you, wash it with warm, soapy water. It's best to use a nail brush, so you can be certain that all of the polish remover is off.

Using the flat end of an orange stick, and a bit of the glue, work it gently and carefully between the break. Press the broken edges of the nail together until they adhere, and you are ready for the next step.

Tear off a small piece of tissue (Betty tells us it is better to tear than to cut, as rough edges adhere better). Place it on the tip of a finger, and, with the flat of the orange stick, smear it well on either side with the glue. Lift it off your finger with the orange stick, place it over the break on top of the nail, smooth it down carefully, and turn the remainder over the edge of the nail, pushing it cautiously underneath the nail and the break. Again, be sure that it is smooth. Allow it to dry thoroughly.

After drying, you are ready to apply a clear base, followed after the proper interval by your favorite colored polish and the last and final step of sealer. Presto! a beautiful nail, with nary a sign of damage.

A further hint to you busy war workers in the art of saving nails: Polish under the tips of your nails strengthens them and prevents breakage.

If you're working in a garden or anywhere else where you get dirty, your nails need special thought. To protect them, why not dig them into a cake of soap first? This simple trick prevents plenty of damage. When the chore is finished, simply wash with a nail brush. Out comes the soap, and your nails are left whole and free of any accumulation of discoloring grime.

Betty tells you, too, to keep that hand lotion handy and in use for all-over hand loveliness.

Do these things, and your hands will speak beautifully for you and for themselves.

Working life for this star began at four with an important role in "The Miracle Child." She went on to playing the screen childhoods of Janet Gaynor, Myrna Loy, and Barbara Stanwyck. She and Shirley Temple were the two youngest stars in talking pictures. Having worked so hard all her life explains Anne's realism and her understanding of people.

"It's a wise girl," she continued, "who can decide when it's smart not to make an issue. Suppose that No. 1 man turns up in a mood and proceeds to sulk. Naturally, a girl feels disappointed and hurt and finally mad. Her impulse is to whip into action and have it out. But if she relieves her mind on the spot, most any of us could write the scene that will follow.

She: Well, it's certainly a riot of fun being out with you! What's the matter?

He: Nothing. Why?

She: You just seem slightly on the tired side this evening.

He: (going tense) I suppose that after a date with that stupendous Peterson, any place or anyone would seem dull.

She: What's the matter with Pete? He's a fine person.

He: Undoubtedly. And so good to his mother. But is that any reason why you had to have your picture taken with him at the Players'?

She: Oh, that! Don't be silly. That was just a publicity thing.

He: Yes. And just one too many.

She: (freezingly) I have to be at the studio early. Do you mind if we leave now?

He: I think it's a swell idea.

"So there she is home an hour later, with the tears coasting down the night cream and that heavenly frock back in the closet.

"Check," I said. "Now give us the correct version."

"Oh, goodness," Anne said, "that depends on a lot of things. But my point about issues is . . . wait! Let him have his mood. You know how you resent being yanked out of one of your own. The next date—it will probably be the next night because he'll have cooled off and be ashamed of his jealousy—the girl could mention that he was quite a character on the other occasion. She can ask him what the matter was when she can see it doesn't matter much any more. Then he'll probably pat her hand and confess about the green-eyed monster. And it will all be all right."

Would Miss Shirley be likewise indulgent toward the tired caller who remains grounded when she enters the room?

"Absolutely not," Anne said. "There is where a girl should not give an inch. Sloppy manners . . . lack of consideration . . . nothing annoys me more than watching some poor girl struggling out of her coat at a restaurant while her escort tosses wisecracks to pals two tables off."

To straighten things out, Anne suggests a crack like, "When you finish cheer-leading, let's see if we can get my coat off." True, that may rile the fellow so that he may retort, "What's the matter? Are you crippled?" And a nice brawl may ensue. But, at any rate, Anne maintains the girl won't have been accessory to loosening one more lazy, ill-mannered man upon the world.

Miss Emily Post Shirley is firmly opposed to a girl's helping out a man's gas ration by meeting him at the appointed restaurant. But she considers service men exceptions to this rule, for they may have come a long way for a few hours of feminine companionship, and she certainly wouldn't expect a man in uniform to hitchhike all the way to her Brentwood home from the airport.

"Our dates in uniform—and of course most of them are—should get the breaks," Anne decrees.

And regarding men in the armed forces, Anne believes that more than a dash of mothering is in order.

"I don't hold with that 'men-are-just-big-babies' theory," she explained. "A baby is a baby" (she has one, lovely two-year-old Julie Anne Payne) "and a man is—or should be—a man. But it's true that it's the men who are the emotionally unstable sex these days. I've lately known of more than one fundamentally decent man to go to pieces and try to sweep a girl off her feet. Sympathy between the sexes is so intensified in wartime, and it's easy to mistake a flash romance for a lasting love."

I said, "What about these rumors that you and Johnny Payne may remarry?"

Anne became suddenly very serious. She has never discussed the reasons for her divorce with anyone—and neither has Johnny.

She said, "John and I have seen each other on two of his furloughs. Both times it was because we had things to discuss about Julie, our daughter. She is John's baby as much as mine, and I want him to have his say in bringing her up—and I want her to know her daddy and love him. But beyond this, John and I have had no meetings.

"I feel concerning myself as I do about all girls today. It is a wise idea in these troubled times for a girl to keep calm and collected enough for two. To bear in mind that a man's whole life is undergoing drastic change. She should take a deep breath before she says yes to a wartime marriage . . . think it over seriously . . . and after weighing the pros and cons . . . well, if it then looks good, may all the happiness in the world be hers!"

The phone was brought to our table. I tried not to listen in too much but I couldn't help gathering from the conversation that Anne was dated up all week, but would be delighted to go dancing next week.

COLOR PORTRAITS OF YOUR FAVORITE STARS

"VITAMIN LACK CAN CAUSE HAIR TO TURN GRAY," SAYS MODERN SCIENCE

Can This 2-Way VITAMIN Discovery Restore Natural Color to Your GRAY or GRAYING HAIR?

NEW TEST SO EASY IT'S AMAZING!

If your hair is gray, graying, streaked or off-color due to vitamin deficiency, this test of the original PANATES double-action VITAMIN treatment offers you amazing new hope! You have read about the scientific vitamin tests that, while too recent for conclusive evidence, have shown startling signs of results. It has been proven beyond doubt that a lack of certain vitamins in the daily diet may be a contributing cause for hair to lose its natural color and turn gray. Simply by improving your diet and by taking the harmless, concentrated food vitamins in PANATES each day, you may check the gray spread . . . you may actually see gray, old-looking, streaked, fading hair change back at the roots, temples and parting to normal, original color, natural color! But first let me tell you what the original PANATES double-action vitamin method is, how PANATES differs so drastically from other anti-gray hair vitamins and why so many of the thousands of women and men who once accepted PANATES on this same trial offer now continue with it because of the amazing change in hair color they testify as taking place before their very eyes!

Panates Is NOT A HAIR DYE

NOTHING TO FEAR . . . NO MESS, NO FUSS

Panates supply not only the "anti-gray" hair vitamins, but give you the "staff of life" wheat germ oil (Vitamin E) as well. Absolutely harmless, Panates actually is a healthful food supplement. Panates gives your system a source for the hair color vitamins that may be lacking in your daily diet and, if so, should literally feed natural color into the hair roots to check gray spread, to help the hair to new, lively lustre and to bring new hope for restoration of normal hair color once again.

Panates isn't a hair dye. Panates is the natural way to seek natural hair color. You can test Panates whether you now artificially color your hair or not, because Panates "Anti-Gray" Hair Vitamins with Wheat Germ Oil Vitamin E, feed your system from within. If you now dye your hair, you may notice you need less and less artificial hair color. If your hair is just starting to turn gray, you may notice the graying process is checked and soon the gray strands may be less and less pronounced. That's one of the wonderful things about the "anti-gray" hair vitamins in Panates . . . the action is natural. No one need know you are doing a single thing for your hair. And ladies, Panates will not hurt or interfere with permanents.

No matter what your normal hair color might be, before graying due to vitamin lack, no matter what shade of black, brown, auburn or blonde, if you see signs of hair color restoration, you will be amazed to note that the new color is the original, normal color of your natural hair.

A Few of The Scores of Letters From Panates Users

Panates, different from other treatments, gives you Vitamin E, Wheat Germ Oil, in addition to Anti-Gray Hair Vitamins. Thousands of women and men the nation over now are taking PANATES. The following are but a few of the many letters we have received. In PANATES there is hope!

TESTIMONIALS

Mrs. G. M., of Illinois, says: "My hair was auburn—a very beautiful shade with a lot of red in it. . . . It started to turn gray about seven years go. . . . When I started to take PANATES, the most I hoped for was to have the white hair darken a little but after three weeks of PANATES, imagine my elation when I noticed I was getting some new hair, and believe it or not, it is decidedly red. . . ."

Mrs. V. S., of Michigan, says: "I have used nearly one box of PANATES and can already see some results. . . ."

Mr. J. M. S., of Virginia, says: "I have just used up one thirty-day treatment of PANATES. I was giving them up, but to my surprise I now see a black beard is coming out on my face and it seems like the hair on my head is getting a little darker. . . ."

THIS TRIAL OFFER IS FAIR AND IT CALLS FOR IMMEDIATE ACCEPTANCE

Is your gray or graying hair due to deficiency in the very vitamins in Panates? We bring you a very fair money-back coupon offer that certainly makes it easy for you to test the Panates treatment yourself to see what Panates' two vitamins may do for you in your fight for the happiness of lovely-looking, natural hair color beauty.

You take no chances. You can test Panates in the confidence these vitamins are taken daily by countless thousands the nation over. Our money-back guarantee is your protection against loss of a single penny. Now, today, mail the coupon. I was an Absentee 3 days each month

Not that I wanted to be absent, but every month it was the same thing. And not just me, mind you—there are plenty other women in our plant who have to let down on their "problem days".

EVERY MINUTE COUNTS

A war-plant nurse reports that their greatest number of absentees are women who miss 1 to 3 days of work each month, frequently on "problem days"! Quite naturally, she asked the people who sell Kotex* sanitary napkins, who are specialists in this subject, to help find a solution.

And then I learned—

I found the answer—how to feel better by following a few simple do's and don'ts. They're all in this new booklet . . . facts on sleeping, diet, exercise, drinking, lifting, showers. How to curb cramps. When to see your doctor. Facts for older women; and for when the stork's expected. Plain talk about tampons. And how to make your sanitary pad give greater comfort!

The greatest star of the screen!

We said we had put our Best Foot Forward, but we've got a still better foot. It's "Girl Crazy."

★ ★ ★ ★

We're crazy about "Girl Crazy" for a combination of reasons. We're Gershwin crazy, Mickey Rooney crazy, Judy Garland crazy, Tommy Dorsey crazy.

Some of us old harkers hark back to the original Broadway show and remember "I Got Rhythm," "Bidin' My Time," "Embraceable You," and other wonderful melodies and lyrics.

★ ★ ★ ★

Well, brethren and sistern, the verdict is in. The screen "Girl Crazy" will delight the harkers-back and delight those butterflies who have recently emerged from the cocoon.

★ ★ ★ ★

From the moment that Mickey meets Judy in that broken-down jalopy and sings "Could You Use Me," the gaiety gets going and keeps going.

★ ★ ★ ★

When Judy sings "They're Writing Songs Of Love But Not For Me," hard hearts melt. When Mickey does his Madison Square Garden routine all sides shake.

★ ★ ★ ★

We can't omit mention of Gil Stratton, "Rags" Ragland, Nancy Walker (remember her in "Best Foot Forward"). Robert E. Strickland, June Allyson and Guy Kibbee. They're a great cast.

★ ★ ★ ★

Fred Finklehoffe did the screen play from the musical by Guy Bolton and Jack McGowan. The great late George Gershwin did the music and brother Ira the lyrics. Norman Taurog directed, Arthur Freed produced.

★ ★ ★ ★

Tommy Dorsey's lively band. Beautiful girls. Loud comedy. In the words of "I Got Rhythm," could you ask for anything more?

★ ★ ★ ★

The story deals with an eastern playboy who gets a degree in discipline from the wild and woolly campus of an Arizona college.

★ ★ ★ ★

It is a colorful production in typical Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer style.

BIRTHDAY PARTY

GLORIA De HAVEN had a birthday party. (She's the girl you want to be sure to see in MGM's "Two Sisters and a Sailor"—coming soon.) But anyway, Gloria de Haven had a birthday party—her nineteenth birthday. (Also, her dad is the ex-musical comedy star, Carter de Haven.) And to this party came quite a few other people you know.

Keenan Wynn, Bunny Walters, and Donald O'Connor seem to be studying something intricate.

The Gene Kellys gang up on Hugh Martin with a good story, it looks like.

Dezi fastens the clasp on Gloria's gold chain. Carter de Haven, Jr. doesn't seem much concerned.

Adventures of
LONGINES
THE WORLD'S MOST HONORED WATCH

The watch that saw service in two world wars

Purchased before the first World War, this Longines gold strap watch served a Canadian officer through four years of hard fighting in France. It ticked the seconds for the zero hour at Vimy Ridge "Hill 70" and in many another notable battle. The war over, it traveled with its owner in the Arctic by sled, schooner and airplane, from Hudson Bay almost to the Pole.

Now after almost 30 years of active and adventurous use, it has already seen a year of service in the second World War, still a faithful timepiece . . . an old and valued friend.

It is to untold thousands of similar experiences that Longines Watches owe their priceless reputation for keeping good time for a long, long time.

THE BOYS LEAVE TOWN

One of the most charming things to happen in Hollywood for a long time was the exit of the "This Is The Army" boys. They left from the front of Hollywood High School between the hours of eight and ten o'clock one evening.

As a farewell gesture, as they loaded into the trucks, they sang "Pagliacci" at the top of their lungs. Almost unnoticed in the large crowd of girls seeing the boys off were some very outstanding movie stars who had made friends with the kids while they were here. Ruth Warrick took time from her rehearsal of the "Orson Welles Magic Show;" Joan Leslie with her two sisters and mother came down to bid a fond farewell. Humphrey Bogart and his wife, Mayo Methot, were shaking hands with all the kids, and over in one truck was Olivia de Havilland, whom the boys were determined to kidnap.

Finally everything was straightened out, and the mighty army trucks rolled off down Sunset Boulevard to the train with the boys singing their sad, sad opera music which eventually died out in the distance.

Many of the boys made lifelong friends in the film colony. Some of them may return after the war to take up film careers, but all of them are welcome at any time in Hollywood, for they are a grand bunch of kids. The show has now been broken up into smaller units so that the boys can go overseas to entertain our boys abroad, some in England, some in North Africa, and all our other battle fronts.

What a Young Wife Should Know To Safeguard Happiness

Improved New Feminine Hygiene Way gives continuous action for hours!

● It is all too true that ignorance of physical facts can wreck any wife's happiness. Yet thousands of women, instead of informing themselves regarding feminine hygiene, either place their dependence on weak, ineffective "home-made" mixtures, or resort to over-strong solutions of acids which can burn, scar and injure delicate tissue.

Today such risks are needless. Well informed women everywhere rely on Zonitors—the new safe, convenient feminine hygiene way!

Zonitors are dainty, snow-white suppositories! Non-greasy. They spread a protective coating and kill germs instantly at contact. Deodorize, by actually destroying odor, instead of temporarily "masking" it. Give continuous action for hours!

Powerful, yet so safe for delicate tissues! Non-poisonous, non-burning. Zonitors help promote gentle healing. No apparatus; nothing to mix. At all druggists.

Movieland's NEW PICTURE GUIDE

CLAUDIA (20th Century-Fox) is a delightful domestic comedy, sensitively and brightly written, played, and directed. Rose Franken, who wrote the stage version from a series of her magazine sketches, has affectionately delved into the fundamentals of American living to tell how one child wife awakened to the responsibilities of marriage and motherhood. Claudia is completely the naive child when her curiosity about her sex appeal leads her to allow herself to be kissed by a neighboring Englishman. But she grows up suddenly when she learns that soon she will bring a new life into the world and that her beloved mother's days are numbered.

Dorothy McGuire, who created the title role on Broadway, makes a brilliant screen debut in the film version. The always reliable Robert Young cleverly plays her husband. Ina Claire is fine as Claudia's valiant mother, Reginald Gardiner amusing as the Englishman, and Olga Baclanova as an opera star.

A LADY TAKES A CHANCE (RKO-Radio) takes place in the strangely nostalgic pre-war, preration, pre-shortages period of 1938. Honestly it is as long ago as that when Jean Arthur, a New York working girl, saved up for a transcontinental bus tour to see the Wonders of the West—"Fourteen Breathless Days of Romance and Adventure. All Expenses Paid." Only there wasn't any romance, and there wasn't any adventure until the girl met John Wayne at an Oregon rodeo. Then she missed her bus, and the romantic adventures that befell her have not been caught so deftly on the screen since "It Happened One Night."

Jean Arthur, fresh from her success in "The More the Merrier," is grand as the working girl on vacation. John Wayne is able as the laconic rodeo star, and Charles Winninger splendid as his older saddle-mate. "A Lady Takes a Chance" is for your recommended picture list.

JOHNNY COME LATELY (United Artists) is James Cagney's first appearance for the independent producing company he and his brother, Bill, organized. The story selected to star Cagney is quite off the beaten path. You may have read it as a Louis Bromfield novel entitled "McLeod's Folly." Cagney smartly plays a wandering newspaper man who stops off in a small town in 1906 long enough to straighten out the affairs of a charming old lady. She is the publisher of the local paper and is being victimized by a crooked political ring. She lacks the strength to fight these politicians until Cagney vigorously takes over her paper.

The gracious charm of this picture is a reflection of the quality Grace George brings to her enchanting portrayal of Mrs. McLeod. For many years a stage star, Miss George finally debuts in Hollywood. She must be persuaded to continue on the screen. Among others who are worthy of note in the film are Marjorie Main and Hattie McDaniel. The proceedings may be a little slow for some tastes, but will be relished by admirers of early Americana. (Continued on page 71)

IN BRIEF REVIEW

LET'S FACE IT (Paramount) is nothing more than a musical version of "The Cradle Snatchers," always an offensive comedy idea. It has been modernized by having the middle-aged wives hire soldiers as escorts who may make their philandering husbands jealous. Just a silly waste of Bob Hope and Betty Hutton, who deserve better consideration.

DESTROYER (Columbia) can be hailed as one of the most human stories of the U. S. Navy since war began. It begins with the laying of the ship's keel and follows through to her fight with the Japs. Edward G. Robinson, Glenn Ford, and Edgar Buchanan.

WE'VE NEVER BEEN LICKED (Universal) stirringly salutes the Fighting Sons of Texas A & M, an American college that now has more than six thousand graduates serving as officers in the U. S. armed forces. Why the school turns out crack officers is told through the experiences of Richard Quine and Noah Beery, Jr., as undergraduates.

THE SEVENTH VICTIM (RKO-Radio) will send shivers down the spines of those who enjoy having their spines chilled. It is a psychological horror yarn about a secret society of devil worshippers and very well performed by newcomers Kim Hunter and Tom Conway, the former as a girl seeking her sister, the latter as a psychiatrist.

FRONTIER BADMEN (Universal) tells a bang-up, big-time tale of the old West which is of strangely contemporary interest inasmuch as it deals with beef. You'll like Robert Paige, Anne Gwynne, Lon Chaney, Andy Devine, and Leo Carrillo in the action, and Diana Barrymore plays a lady gambler.

SALUTE TO THE MARINES (MGM) treats of Wallace Beery's plight when he thinks he is going to be retired as the only non-combatant Marine in history. He gets his discharge in the Philippines without having seen foreign battle service. Then the war, in Technicolor, comes to him. It's only average Beery.

THE MAN FROM DOWN UNDER (MGM) but for the grace of its locale would have been another Beery picture. So Charles Laughton plays the veteran of World War I who finds he is too old for the current war. The main points of interest in a dull story are the Australian background and an excellent performance of a prize fighter by Richard Carlson.

HOLLYWOOD ENTERTAINS

. . . and very unselfishly, as most of you fellows and girls in the armed services know. Just for more black and white proof of this entertainment, we're giving you three pictures. Top—Judy Garland singing at the Hollywood Canteen. And below—Lee Bowman jitterbugging with a WAC at Fort MacArthur, and George Raft signing autographs at the Fort. See the picture of Grable over George's head?

COTTEN TO COTTEN

The other night Joseph Cotten was impatiently waiting for Mrs. Cotten to finish dressing so they could be on their way to a nearby camp where the actor, along with Orson Welles and Rita Hayworth, was to entertain. To hurry things along, Cotten got the car out of the garage. He honked his horn a few times, but there was no response, so he settled himself for a long wait.

When finally Mrs. Cotten joined him, he gently took her hand in his and said softly, "You know, dear, if I should die before you do, just remember this: I'll be up there—" and the actor gazed dramatically at the heavens, "wanting you, missing you, needing you, and waiting for you—AS USUAL!"

MOVIE STARS HARD TO GET AT?

By way of contrast, Judy Canova is a lead pipe cinch for the boys who know her.

The other day a charming Major Hack from Sheppard Field in Texas came into Hollywood. It was his first visit and he was admittedly goggle-eyed about seeing the film town. His one film acquaintance was Judy Canova who had visited his camp.

He was informed that the only way to get to a movie star was to call the publicity department of her studio and ask them to call her and then perhaps she might call back. This he did.

In ten minutes the hospitable Canova was on the phone. She arranged for hotel rooms, which the boys couldn't get as the town was filled up, invited them for dinner at her house, took them night clubbing and introduced them to numerous movie stars.

The Major and his friends had a wonderful three days in the film town, thanks to Judy, and went away singing Hollywood's praises. She had promised that if they came to Hollywood, she would show them a good time, and she stuck to her promise.

GOOD OLD-FASHIONED FRIENDSHIP

Friendship is a warm and lovely thing to know and to watch. For the past five years there has been a triumvirate of friends on the Warner lot who have been inseparable during high water and closeups. They are Jane Wyman, Ann Sheridan, and Howard Shoup. Shoup was the designer at the studio who rose to prominence with the girls. He is now a corporal in the Army and stationed near Fresno, two hundred miles from Hollywood. Howard wrote to Ann that he liked the camp and the Army life, but that he felt sorry for the boys there as they had had no entertainment for nine months.

He was delightfully surprised when he came to Hollywood for a week-end leave one Friday night and found the two girls waiting at a friend's house for him.

He was more surprised when they loaded him into Ann's car and headed back to Fresno. The girls had decided that they would do a personal appearance at the camp because of his letters and had waited until he came to Hollywood to escort them back to camp.

They each wore dresses that Shoup had designed for them to wear in pictures and gave the boys a full hour show.

HOLLYWOOD LOSES GRABLE

Honestly, Betty Grable is going to give up movies as soon as she finishes "Pin-Up Girl" for Twentieth Century-Fox. The reason is that she, Mrs. Harry James, is going to have a baby, and maybe Betty isn't all thrilled and happy! She's excited as only she can be excited about anything. Maybe she'll come back to the screen afterwards . . . maybe not.

PATRIOTIC AMERICAN WIFE

It is no more than many another American wife is doing, but happening across Mrs. Robert Montgomery the other day, I felt that a very special bow goes to her and the Hollywood women like her. Betty, who before the war was as cute a girl as you would find in the entire film colony, had great rings of fatigue below her eyes on the day I bumped into her.

The night before, she explained, was her night at the aircraft warning service. At five a.m. she had to meet her daughter Elizabeth returning from summer camp.

But Mrs. Montgomery beamed when she explained how she was to go up to visit Bob, temporarily stationed in Seattle, that close to home for the first time since he entered service.

"Frances Fonda was there, picking up her child from the same camp this morning," Betty explained. "She bucked me up tremendously by looking just as sleepy as I did."

Not a word of complaint out of Betty because the Montgomerys had to sell their exquisite Holmby Hills estate in order to live on Bob's Naval pay. No nonsense out of her about having to do most of her own maid work currently And most certainly, Betty never mentions the very long hours she spends at the Red Cross Blood Bank, trying to find blood donors. Like husband Bob Montgomery, she just believes in doing all she can every moment of the time to help our country.

HOW TO RENT A HOUSE

This is Lynn Bari's own story. She had rented a house in Stone Canyon, Bel-Air and when she wanted to move out was stuck with a year's lease. A friend recommended a certain real estate woman, saying she was wonderful about getting good tenants. The woman came out, consulted Lynn, looked the house over and told her it would be rented inside of two days. It was. Lynn found the ad in the morning newspapers.

"Movie star's house for rent. Movie star will show you through personally."

Lynn did.

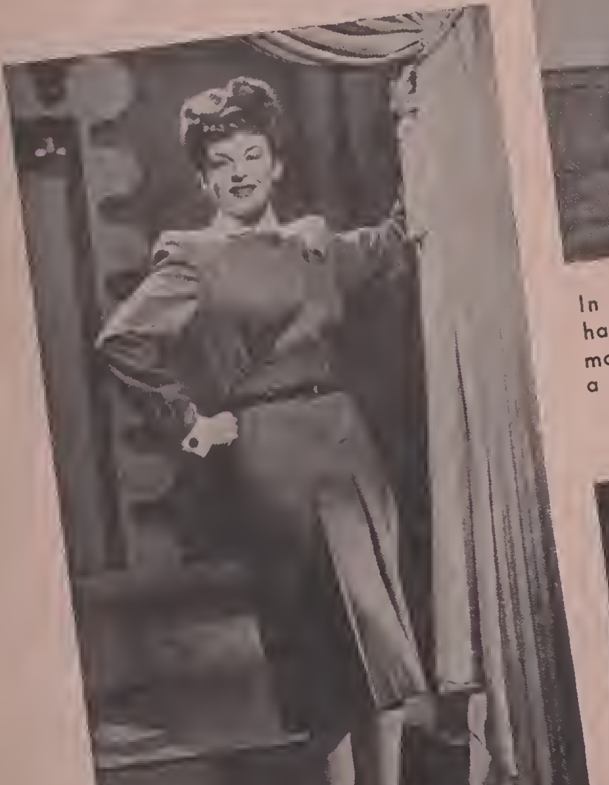
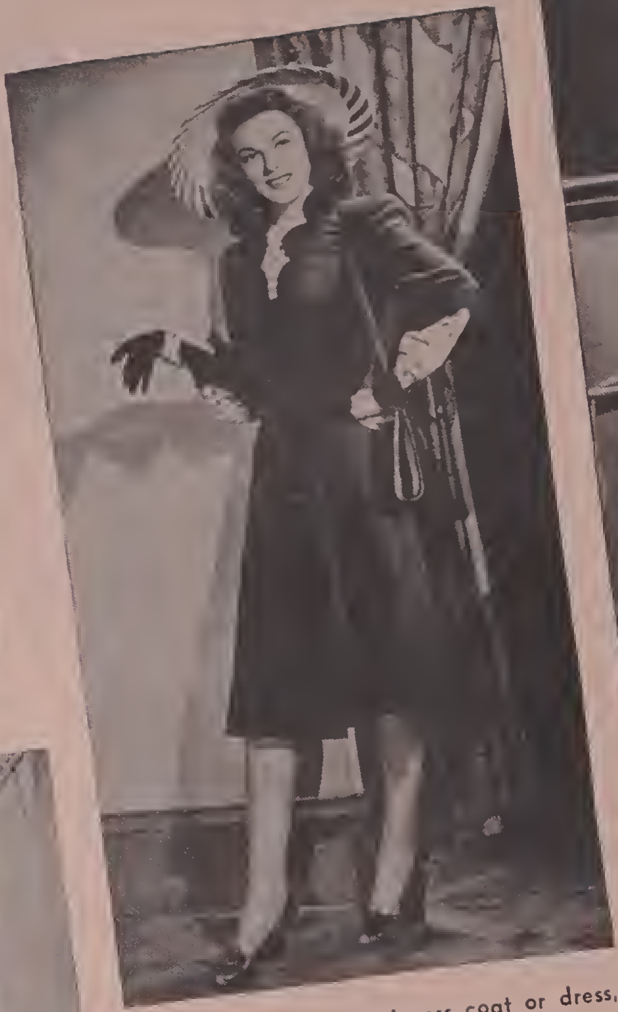
THESE FASHIONS are PATRIOTIC

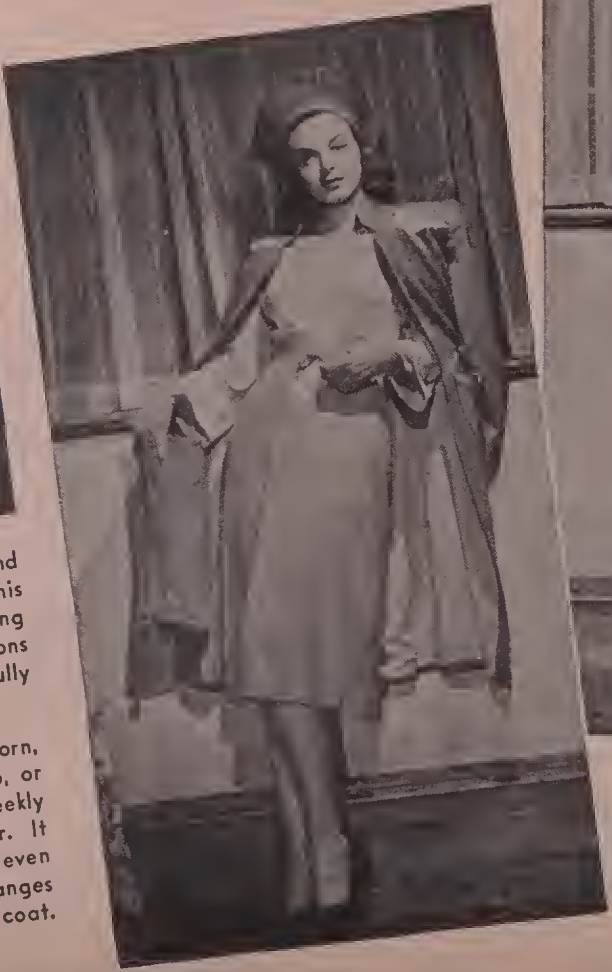


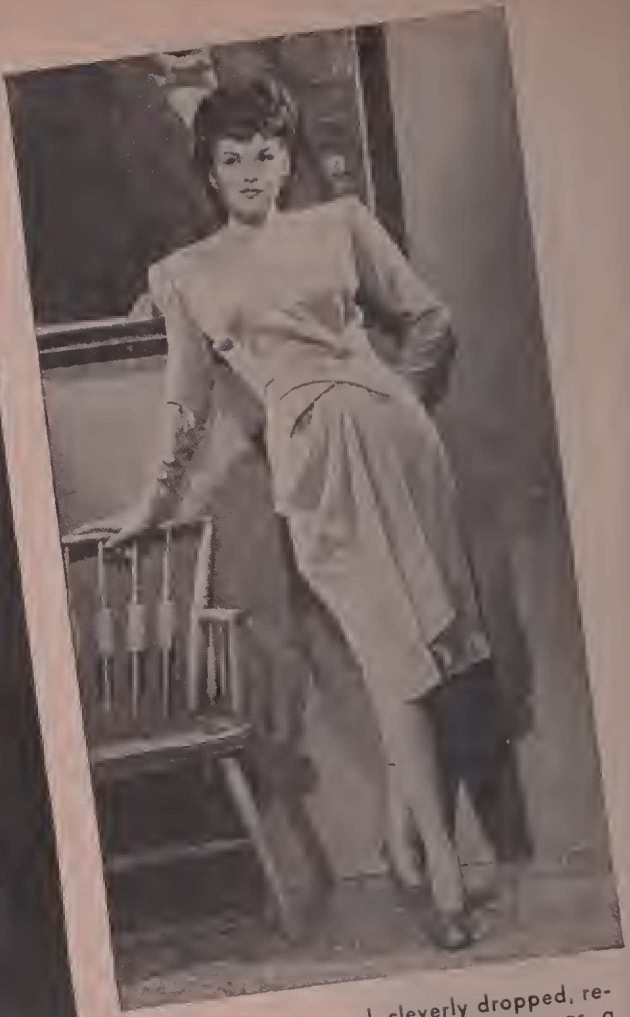
Marguerite Chapman, Columbia's new and fast-ascending glamour girl, designed this dress and all her new fall wardrobe, keeping all our government's new style limitations severely in mind. Yet what a delightfully smart result she achieved.

The above all-day dress can be worn, equally smartly, to an office for the job, or to the dinner date for fun. It fastens sleekly even without the dear, departed zipper. It uses non-priority buttons, gets fullness even with narrow pleats, and is a gem for changes of accessories and to wear under a fur coat.

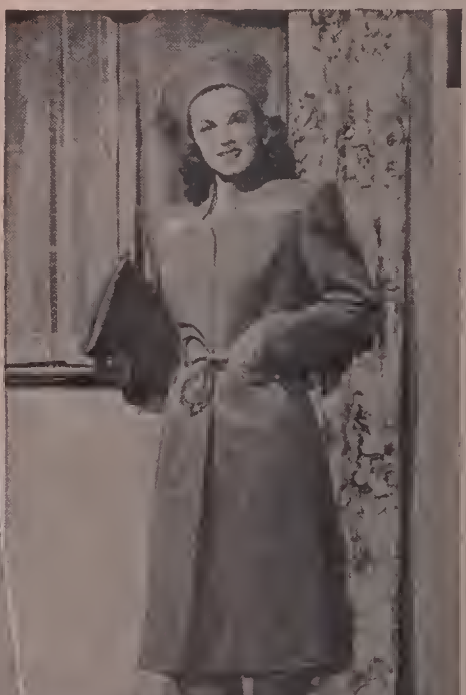


In case you have a princess coat or dress, hanging about in your wardrobe, you can make it very new and charming by adding a peppermint striped dickey and sleeves.





A dusty pink light wool, cleverly dropped, requires only one big, covered button as a fastening. Watch for Marguerite next in "Appointment in Berlin."



Above and to the left—There is not an inch of wasted fabric in this two-tone gray wool ensemble on which little bows are used as fastenings.

TWO MINDS . . . BUT WITH DIFFERENT IDEAS!

To him love's a dizzy detour on a road curving back to freedom. To her it's a one way trail to the altar. Hang on tight, folks . . . it'll be rough going . . . but funny!

WORDS of MUSIC

By JILL WARREN

DIG me, public dear, Another month and another sounding-off on my part. Thanks for the fan letters, which I am answering to each of you individually and personally, I hope. On that letter routine, remember I like to get them. Send them in to me at Movieland, 9126 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles, and I will make with the answers. Last month practically all you asked me was what was with Frank Sinatra, but you must have questions you wanted answered on people besides Frank. So write and I'll reply.

Meanwhile here's a few answers to your musical questions before you even knew you were worrying about the subject.

THE TUNEFILMS:

At the rate Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer is going, they'll soon have more musicians under contract than actors. Both the Dorseys, Jimmy and Tommy, Bob Crosby, Vaughn Monroe, Harry James, Xavier Cugat, Spike Jones, and Guy Lombardo are now on the weekly payroll. Metro's latest musical film, "Girl Crazy," gives us the Tommy Dorsey band again plus Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney.

Mickey does a piano solo with the band, but unlike most movie heroes who play an instrument for the camera, Mickey really plays, and good, too.

All the Gershwin tunes from the original New York show are still there plus a couple of new ones. And wait until you see T.D. in cowboy togs!

Harry James has finished his first picture for MGM, "Mr. Co-Ed," in which he shares honors with Red Skelton, and they are rushing his second one, as yet untitled, before he has to report to his draft board for induction . . . Twentieth Century-Fox's musical frozen pudding, "Wintertime," has Sonja Henie ice skating to Woody Herman's music. The band is featured in two numbers, "Later Tonight," a pretty ballad, and "Wintertime."

After the first few days shooting on "Pin-Up Girl," the Betty Grable starrer, the powers that be decided that Charlie Spivak's part should be enlarged, so they gave him additional lines and another number to do. Which should certainly please the Spivak fans. Everybody on the set was ribbing Betty, telling her she was surrounded by trumpet players; working all day with Spivak and then Harry James to go home to. . . . R.K.O.'s "The Sky's The Limit" is distinguished by its wonderful Johnny Mercer-Harold Arlen score. The tunes can't miss being on the hit parade. The prettiest one is "My Shining Hour," which is also used as a theme all through the picture. Then there is a torcher entitled "One For My Baby," which should turn out to be a sequel to Mercer's "Blues In The Night."

Universal has a laugh riot in their new Olsen and Johnson musical, "Crazy House." They set out to kid Hollywood about itself, and what a great job they do of it. The finale includes such musicalights as Count Basie and his band, The Modernaires, Marion Hutton, and The De Marcos. . . .

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC?

Although the record situation vs. the labor situation is still up in the air, the recording companies have managed to come through with some releases which were made before the ban went on, plus a few sans musicians. . . . Victor offers Perry Como as an answer to Dick Haymes and Frank Sinatra. His first sides are "Goodbye, Sue" and "There'll Soon Be A Rainbow" with choral background.

Decca's new release should sell a million copies. It's Bing Crosby doing the two hit tunes from his picture "Dixie"—"Sunday, Monday, or Always" and "If You Please." Bing is in excellent voice, and is backed up by the Ken Darby singers, with no orchestral accompaniment whatsoever. But the band isn't even missed. Darby has done such fine things with vocal effects that you'll almost think you're hearing guitars, violins, and a string bass.

The Capitol Folks have a low-down blues disc by a colored gentleman named T-Bone Walker. The tunes are "Mean Old World" and "I Gotta Break, Baby." T-Bone's style is a little like Joe Turner's, which is a compliment. . . . They are also releasing a new side by Martha Tilton. It's the good old standby "Comin' Through the Rye" swing-arranged by Gordon Jenkins and the band, and possibly the best record Martha has ever made. . . .

EARMARKS OF HITS:

There seems to be no stopping Frank Loesser. After his wonderful tunes from "Thank Your Lucky Stars," he comes up with a new one which everyone will be singing before long—"What Do You Do In The Infantry?" It is dedicated to the Infantry forces of the United States Army, and I'll be surprised if they don't adopt it as their official song.

From the pen of Duke Ellington we have a beautiful thing in "Do Nothing Till You Hear From Me." Harry James introduced it on the air with Helen Forrest singing the lyrics, and I don't think it can escape the Hit Parade. "My Heart Tells Me" is a haunting ballad by Mack Gordon and Harry Warren from the picture "Sweet Rosie O'Grady." The Andrews Sisters have been doing a song on their theatre tour called "Send Me a Man, Amen!" which is a solid sender. It brought down the house at every show at the New York Paramount Theatre, which is a pretty good indication that it'll be a hit. The girls also introduced another tune which might well become known as K.P. theme song. It was written by Corporal Sid Robin of the "This Is The Army" show, and its title speaks for itself—"Peelin' Those Potatoes, Slicin' Those Tomatoes, Liftin' Up Those Garbage Can Blues."

The sensation of the juke boxes has been a little hill-billy ditty called "Pistol Packin' Mamma" written by Al Dexter and recorded on the Okeh label by Dexter and his Troopers. The sheet music sales have been terrific, and it looks like it will turn out to be another "Deep In The Heart of Texas."

JAM NOTES:

Benny Goodman's next picture for Twentieth Century-Fox will be "King of Swing"—the story of Benny's own life. It was written by Richard English, the well-known magazine and film writer, who has done so many fine stories on musicians.

Freddy Slack, who disbanded his orchestra in July, has had a change of heart and reorganized. Freddy was suffering from an old professional ailment, agency trouble, but now he is all straightened around and is playing theatres across the country. He has a new singer, Peggy Goodwin, and he thinks he may have another, Ella Mae Morse, on his hands. The Andrews Sisters' next musical for Universal will be, of all things, a western, and is tentatively titled "Sailors on Horseback."

Marion Hutton, who sang with Glenn Miller until Glenn dissolved his band and accepted a captaincy in the Army, has been ticketed at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Her first role will be with Harry James in "Mr. Co-Ed." Jimmy Engler, former vocalist with Johnny Long's orchestra, has been nabbed by Twentieth Century-Fox and has already been given a dramatic part in "Guadalcanal Diary." Twentieth also signed Dick Haymes to a seven-year contract to start as soon as he finishes his New York night club engagements. Perry Como, who went out on his own after the Ted Weems band went into the Merchant Marine, was signed by Twentieth Century-Fox. It looks as if Frank Sinatra really started something!

Jimmy Dorsey's Hollywood Palladium opening was one of the biggest in the Palladium's history, with all Jimmy's fellow band leaders turning out to greet him. Brother Tommy was there with his new bride, Pat Dane, and Harry James was with his new bride, Betty Grable. Also present were Charlie Spivak, Lt. Rudy Vallee, Eddie Miller, Corporal David Rose, Matty Malneck, and Stanley Kenton. And it's the best band Jimmy's ever had.

Hugh Martin and Ralph Blaine, the youthful songwriting team who burst into fame with their "Best Foot Forward" score on Broadway, have been signed to a termer at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Their first assignment is to write the songs for Judy Garland's next one, "Meet Me In St. Louis." . . . MGM made Tommy Dorsey a terrific offer to sign with them as musical adviser and director, but so far Tommy has turned it down. It would mean giving up his band.

Did you know that Dr. Leopold Stokowski is a swing fan and really goes for jazz music? I didn't either, until I happened to tune in one night to Don Otis' record show on a local Los Angeles Station, KFAC. It seems that Dr. Stokowski was delegated by the Office of War Information to prepare a transcription on the birth and development of jazz music to be broadcast to the troops overseas.

He called upon Don to help him rig up some old collectors' items, and because of Don's aid he paid a personal visit to Otis' show. He was on the air for an hour and introduced and played what he considered to be ten representative records showing the development of jazz music, and went on to explain why he had picked those ten.

Here are the titles and the recording artists: "Tiger Rag" by the Original Dixieland Five, "Sensation" by Fletcher Henderson's band, "West End Blues" by Louis Armstrong and his Hot Five, "Farewell Blues" by Eddie Lang and Joe Venuti and their All Stars, Duke Ellington's "It Don't Mean a Thing," Jimmy Lunceford's "Organ Grinder's Swing," Artie Shaw's "Begin The Beguine," "Woodchopper's Ball" by Woody Herman's band, Tommy Dorsey's "Song of India" and Harry James' "Strictly Instrumental."

"Jazz is an important part of our folk music," said "Stoky"—"It has no tradition, no limitations—so it will go on forever developing as long as musicians give free rein to their imaginations. Jazz is unique. There has never been anything like it. In this kind of music the United States is second to none in the whole world."

Thanks for those kind words, Dr. Stokowski. I'm sure you have made many new friends for swing music, as well as for yourself.

LETTERS FROM OUR BOYS IN THE SERVICE . . . . . .

$5.00 LETTER

Let me tell you what we think of one of Hollywood's most famous actors, Henry Fonda. I just came from San Diego where "Hank" is going to the Navy's quartermaster school. I slept in the bunk next to him for about one week and talked to him on numerous occasions.

Above all he's quiet and minds his own business. He doesn't have that air of being a very important fellow. If you couldn't see his face, you'd say he was just another gob.

He knows what he wants in the Navy, and he's getting it the hard way. No doubt he could have pulled strings and come in as an officer or with a rating. But he's going to school as a first class seaman and trying to get his rating that way. We respect him for this. He's easy to get along with as long as you treat him just as you would any of your other shipmates. He's going to go up fast.

$5.00 LETTER

A few months ago when I was stationed at Harlingen Army Gunnery School in Texas as a driver in the Quartermaster Corps, I was called out to drive early one Sunday morning. This made me mad because it was the first Sunday I had had off for some time.

I was told to go to the hotel uptown and pick up several men, who would be out in front of the hotel. I hadn't the slightest idea who they were, but I carried out my orders.

When I arrived at the hotel I came face to face with six gentlemen, and then I was pleased to work that Sunday even if I did have it off. For there stood Richard Arlen, Dick Purcell, William Benedict, Chester Morris, Keith Richard, and Jimmy Lydon, better known as "Henry Aldrich."

They all greeted me, and after taking them to the camp, I found out they were going to make a picture from there. The next day we went to Port Isabell. I talked to Chester Morris and Jimmy Lydon for some time and found they were cut from the same pattern as those buddies who bunk next to me. They gave me their autographs and took snapshot pictures with me. A number of the other boys asked to have their autographs and pictures taken with them. There was never a refusal. They talked and joked with us.

Even though they didn't have much time, they were never too busy to answer or talk to a soldier. I spent several weeks with them while making the picture, "Aerial Gunner." I gather it's a swell picture, and as I was in different parts of it, I am now anxiously waiting for it to come out.

Thirty-one years old, six feet three in height, handsome, debonair John Payne is too heavy to be a fighter pilot. He could, what with the hours he had in the air as a civilian, be an instructor or go into civil aeronautics, but Johnny's heart is set upon really getting into the scrap.

On leaves from his Arizona post (as we go to press, he's there) he rushes back to Hollywood to see one small Julie Ann, his daughter, and June Havoc, with whom he has so many laughs that no one in movieland takes it seriously as a romance. John's last picture was "Hello, Frisco, Hello."

the things the ROBERT TAYLORS will miss

Below—Mr. and Mrs. Robert Taylor all dressed up and going night-clubbing at the Mocombo.

ALONG the street there came a sputtering of motors, a growl of speed, a swooping of long legs, brown leather jacket, and the torpedo body of a Harley-Davidson. The vehicle, triumphant with rider, parked before the door of a rambling white house in Beverly Hills; a shout went up. "Hey, Barbara, come see what I just bought."

Barbara Stanwyck, looking like a fugitive from a grade school picnic with her hair blowing free from a white ribbon bow and her small, lithe body decked out in white blouse and pinafore came running from the rear patio.

"Another motorcycle!" she gasped.

Bob Taylor eulogized its salient points, beaming. With great care he explained that his first motorcycle, being of British manufacture, might present a parts problem if some gimmick went to pieces. In Los Angeles there is only one man capable of repairing such a machine; and the time involved in securing a really important engine adjunct might be considerable. So-oo-o, naturally, the sensible thing to have done was to have purchased a motorbike of American manufacture.

Gradually Bob's hearty flood of conversation dried to a mere trickle of words. Sheepishly, Mr. Taylor grinned at his wife. "If I should be stationed somewhere near here while I'm taking my basic training," he said without conviction, "a motorcycle would be very convenient."

Barbara met his eyes, and suddenly they were laughing together. Between them, in that brief glance, passed the memory of many another spontaneous Taylor purchase. There had been, for instance, the time when he came in with the announcement (before they were married) that he had bought a ranch adjoining the one owned at that time by Barbara.

"But what on earth did you want a ranch for?" she had asked incredulously.

"Well, you have one. I thought it might be fun to go rural, too," was the best extemporaneous excuse he had to offer. Months later, when it became impossible to get help, when the expenses piled up, and the income dug an escape tunnel through the basement, when gasoline was to be rationed, and a ranch became a toy more exotically expensive than a herd of kangaroos, both Barbara and Bob sold out.

Shortly before the final decision was made, however, Bob had come in one day looking very country squireish. "I just bought another horse—a honey of a little brood mare," he had admitted in the general tone of a school boy who has announced the adoption of a mangy, flea-ridden stray pup. The Taylors owned four horses at that time, but there had been much discussion about their disposal in case the ranches were sold.

Barbara glanced up casually from the script she had been studying. "A fifth horse was exactly what you needed," she had agreed with charm. "Exactly."

And now, looking down upon this second motorcycle, she saw in it all the ranches, all the horses, all the acquisitions Bob had collected during the gay and glorious civilian days now terminating.

"When you're safely at work in the Navy and forced to confine your personal possessions to the dimensions of a foot locker, I'm going to miss your spontaneous purchases," she admitted. She tried to grin. "Yes, sir, it's going to seem funny—never being called to inspect some crazy gadget you've brought home."

Bob brightened perceptibly. The deviltry suddenly glistened in his eyes. "If I should get overseas . . ." he said tentatively.

Barbara winced. "Five 'rickshaws!" she groaned. "I can see them now, lined up in some sort of a carriage house behind the garage."

Another of Bob's spontaneous habits, the consequences of which Barbara is going to miss, is his darting in some evening to announce blithely that he is going hunting. Bob has little patience with the planned trip, the carefully mapped itinerary. He likes spur-of-the-moment traveling, undertaken with as little preparation as possible.

On more than one occasion Barbara has greeted his announcement with an expressionless face and the calm question, "What about that dinner party for twelve that we are having tonight? It was your suggestion originally—remember?"

"Oh—that. Well, that's different." And a frustrated hunter ascended the stairs to shower, shave, and get dressed for dinner.

By contrast, Barbara likes to plan things far in advance. "Some of the happiest times of my life were spent on trips I didn't take," she told her pal, Lillian MacMurray (Fred's wife) one night.

She enjoys collecting travel folders and maps, she likes to make lists of interesting spots to visit and things worth buying. Just before war broke out in 1939, she had perfected plans for a superduper trip to England aboard the Queen Mary. She had spent months getting clothes together, and studying the globe. "Let's go anyway," she suggested to Bob. "I'm not afraid of subs."

But by that time Mr. Taylor had been allowed too much time to cogitate on the entire project. He was opposed to it as being too cut-and-dried.

Barbara and Bob also have diverse viewpoints on modes of travel; they are going to miss the friendly controversies undertaken when they are considering a trip. Bob's idea is to go anywhere in leisurely fashion. He adores boat trips because he can eat and sleep and laze on deck. Barbara prefers to fly. The process frightens her to the chattering point—she has never flown with Bob except once—but she adores the idea of the time she is saving. When she and Bob went to the West Indies on a vacation several years ago, she wanted to fly.

"To go by boat," she contended reasonably in the face of Bob's evening newspaper, "will take four unnecessary days. If I only had four more days to live, I'd consider them pretty important. I wouldn't want to waste them on a boat. I can see everything a boat has to interest me in about four hours."

"Mm-mmm," said Bob from the sports page. They went by boat.

Recently Bob observed, "When I'm in the Navy, I'll bet you're going to miss my leisurely way of getting places. You'll wear yourself out . . . hurrying somewhere. You'll spend your time flying . . . and be scared stiff. You should learn to relax, Ruby Brugh."

Barbara's book barely missed his left ear. That "Ruby Brugh" routine never fails to horrify her. Comes from her former legal name, Ruby Stevens, and Bob's former tag, Spangler Brugh. When Barbara wants to get his goat, she calls him "Spangler."

There is another good-natured family feud in the Taylor household that both are going to miss. It's a feud, the details of which are probably repeated in ninety-nine and forty-four hundredths percent of American homes.

Bob and Barbara have been invited, we'll say, to the Jack Bennys for dinner. Bob is sitting in the den, reading a book on the current world (Continued on page 89)

Debunking THE LUPINO Legend

AT ONE time or another Ida Lupino has been described: (1) as a dizzy blonde with an English accent who was brought over all the way from London to play "Alice in Wonderland," until Hollywood found out that she radiated as much sweetness and light as Scarlett O'Hara or the late Ivan the Terrible; (2) a more than slightly mad dame with a neurotic passion for murder, blood, ghosts; (3) a girl who likes to tell fortunes by tea leaves, walks in her sleep, adores playing frustrated women, drinks her tea lying flat on her back, preferably on the floor, and is as easy to handle as a pint of molten steel.

All three versions warn you to keep a step or two away from Lupino, because whatever you do and say will make her mad, and when Lupino gets mad . . . brother, you better be gone.

Actually, Ida Lupino is one-hundred per cent emotional but otherwise a quite nice and normal girl with a passion for rebelling against the dull pattern of life. She pretends to hate the Lupino Legend which gives you the details of her alleged madness; but somehow we can't help feeling that Ida is very well pleased about her semi-lunatic reputation.

She figures she'd rather be lunatic than dull, and who wouldn't? So she carefully feeds you inconspicuous little items referring to her "madness" and works hard to destroy any ideas you might have of her being a demure, sane, and normal person.

BY JOSEPH WECHSBERG

She writes her marine husbond daily.

She loves to wear slacks.

She's always on top of a hill.

When we told her that we were going to debunk the Lupino Legend, she didn't seem very happy.

"Oh, I'm a little mad," she said. "I do the most unexpected things. Once I went to have dinner with my husband, and on the way we saw the most beautiful house for sale. We didn't have dinner that night, but we did buy the house."

We said we thought most artists were a little on the impulsive side. Ida stared at us fiercely. "I have my mad moments. There is a little black devil inside me." She took a deep breath and pressed together her lips. We were afraid she'd utter the famous Lupino Scream.

"Sometimes I must fight that devil," she said. "It's a terrible fight. So far I've always won."

We were having lunch with Lupino and her inside-devil, her lunch consisting of a fruit bowl, two five-minute boiled eggs, toast and a bottle of milk—which didn't strike us as an especially devilish diet. Seeing that we weren't much impressed, Lupino continued:

"Some day I'm going to lose that fight. It will be very bad for all of us. I have moods, lots of moods and some of them very dark."

"Well, all nice women have," we said.

She didn't listen. "When I'm among people, I like to go into a corner all by myself and imagine that I am those people. I try to get into them, so to speak, studying their thoughts and emotions and motives. Oh, it's a very fascinating game."

She called the waitress and ordered another bottle of milk which she carried with herself to the set.

We watched her on the set, trying to take in everything around her, and we realized this was nothing but an artist's obsession to do an excellent job.

Her record proves that at several occasions she turned down money—big money—and walked out of a studio because she didn't like the part. Consequently, Hollywood walked out on her, and she had to go the hard way to come back, breaking down obstacles that would have all but finished a person of lesser strength. She never makes concessions and never will. With her it never was salary or star-billing that she demanded, but a good story and a good part. Success and money are nice things, she admits; but what are they compared to the wonderful satisfaction that goes with a good piece of work?

We asked what kind of parts she'd really like to play.

"I don't mind what it is as long as it is real people. I've fought hard to make my characters convincing. Some people say, 'Lupino should laugh,' or 'Ida, stop being neurotic.' I don't mind committing a couple of murders and having my face covered with blood and dirt, and wearing the most horrible burlap dresses, if I play a real, flesh-and-blood character—not a silly, contrived figure.

"That's why I liked my part in 'Ladies in Retirement' best. That girl wasn't merely a scheming murderess; you saw how she became that way, what made her do it. Sure, I like comedy too. I like everything that's good. I'd like to play a great love story against a modern background."

Lupino is just as emphatic about what she does not want to play. (She is emphatic about most things.) She hates those phony, one (Continued on page 84)

BLOOD AND SANDERS

George Sanders may be the only actor extant who can be called good, "bad," and completely indifferent

A DARING lady columnist edged up to George Sanders on the set recently, and after first ascertaining that she was within walking not running distance to the nearest exit, asked him a typical interview question:

"Mr. Sanders, is there any particular role you have always dreamed of playing on the screen?"

"Why yes, there is," he answered her pleasantly enough. "I should like to play an invalid . . . and stay in bed throughout the whole picture."

The lady took her one foot out of the air where she had left it, posed for flight. The answer wasn't exactly what she had in mind, but so far she had suffered nothing more serious than a clipped accent to the jaw.

"If you had an absolute choice of leading ladies for your pictures, whom would you pick?"

"Ingrid Bergman, of course."

"Of course. Uh . . . why?"

"Because she has such an air of respectability."

"Oh."

Respectability has never lured anyone to the box-office yet. In Miss Bergman's behalf, she asked, "Would you care to enlarge upon that . . . a little?"

"Of course, Miss Bergman has none of the acquired glamour which becomes so tiresome in other actresses."

His somewhat glacial charm can be attributed to the fact that he is so definitely and elegantly male. He has that peculiarly disturbing effect on women that makes them wonder whether, in a clinch, they would prefer to fight it out with soft words or a sharp scissors. (George Sanders with Marguerite Chapman between scenes of "Appointment in Berlin.")

There is no truth to the legend that the Talkie Town Terror spends all his time between scenes disdainfully sleeping or crouched in his dressing room, thinking up ways to scare grown-ups. Much of his time is spent at the piano—he has an excellent repertoire of ditties, most of them on the ribald side.

He has a totally out-of-character giggle, a high-pitched indication of mirth which never fails to surprise, coming as it does out of a perpetually dignified countenance. (Here he is giggling with Sterling Campbell, technical advisor on the Columbia lot.)

He is also appearing in "The Night Is Ending" for 20th Century.

The lady had her interview, and as Sanders interviews go, it was practically a scoop. True to the feminine trait of never knowing when the party is over, she pushed her luck.

"You prefer your leading ladies with an 'air of respectability.' Would you tell me what appeals to you most in women off-screen?"

Mr. Sanders made ready for the knock-out.

"Why, certainly—the reverse!"

The interview was not definitely finished.

In all Hollywood there is no one so proficient at the verbal Mickey Finn as the bored Britisher. This particular talent has given him the reputation for being a lot of things which innately he is not; temperamental, discourteous, a misogynist, a "character." Things have now advanced to the stage where hardly a columnist in town can afford to make him the subject of affable comment for fear of contradicting a previously written item.

There are a lot of people who will tell you he enjoys living up to his reputation as l'homme horrible. At 20th Century-Fox (where "Moon and Sixpence" is still sometimes referred to as "Moon and Sanders"), you can still reduce any publicity man to a state of dehydration by recalling the time, a few months ago, when it was discovered that the bachelor Englishman had become a benedict.

Mr. Sanders, being in a marrying mood, had done so without notifying either the press or his studio. Presently there came a hint, in this column and that one, that a lady was now occupying the Sanders' menage. Other news-gatherers called the publicity department to check.

In Hollywood, the lack of a denial is affirmation, and Beginning his screen career with a poisonously villainous role in "Lloyds of London," he has grown on the public like a slow case of undulant fever, accompanied by both chills and fever. As in the case of Humphrey Bogart, it took his movie bosses a while to realize that the fans had awarded him a star's status. (Above is Mr. Sanders in a scene from "Appointment in Berlin.") vice versa. "You'll have to make some sort of statement," the star was told.

"Oh, now will I?" he asked in a tone that drew blood. "Well, then, just tell them I said the lady and I are living together!"

The publicity department declared an immediate moratorium on the Sanders marriage, carefully responding to all conversation on the subject with a five-minute lull.

The real truth about him is that George Sanders is a gentleman, a species once aptly defined as "a fellow who never insults anyone unintentionally." His inherent characteristics are a bitter intelligence, and an inability to be bothered with the things or people he considers trivial. The fact that he is unable to find much that he does not consider trivial, just happens to be unfortunate for those to whom the same things are important.

Born with a rare ennui, he has developed it into a beautifully wrought armor against the things most cinemanians believe they cannot do without. He is probably the only actor extant who falls into all classifications; good, "bad" . . . and completely indifferent! Living up to any sort of personal reputation isn't worth his effort. Favorable publicity concerns him least of all, since it calls for a sustained and synthetic pleasantry he disdains. He prefers to confine his acting to the screen. Considering his success, he has as much right to his opinion as the rest of Hollywood has to theirs.

Recently, when he moved over to the Columbia lot to star in "Appointment in Berlin," the entire staff figuratively fastened their safety belts. The word was around, of course, that the Sanders personality was a chill wind that blew nobody any good. After a week of shooting, tension eased to a positive state of letdown. The camera crew quit tip-toeing, and the publicity staff began to wonder whether the fascinating Mr. Sanders wasn't being so nice just to be nasty. After all, there were columnists waiting to be serviced with bits of printable spleen.

In two weeks, things had got to such a state that when a wag rushed off the set one day and made the statement, "At last, Sanders has bared the ivories!" he gathered an eager crowd.

"What did he say?" they chorused, pencils palpitating.

"Nothing. He's singing. Sitting at the piano and entertaining a bunch of prop men!"

As a matter of truth, too, there is little basis for the legend that the Talkie Town Terror spend all his time between scenes disdainfully sleeping, or crouched in his dressing room thinking up ways to scare grown-ups. He occupies a great deal of his time at the piano, regaling the grips and crew with his excellent repertoire of ditties, most of them on the ribald side. The piano is moved from sound-stage to sound-stage as the picture progresses. For more serious-minded admirers, he has a quick course in piano technique in which he will patiently instruct anyone who is really interested. It happens that he likes music.

Another hobby is building model airplanes. At home he goes in for fourteen foot jobs that will really fly. On the set he folds sheets of script into schoolboy models that whiz through the air, over the director's head, with the greatest of ease.

If anyone thinks that the sight of a six-footer, attired in the full dignity of Nazi officer regalia, chasing a blue paper airplane back and forth across the set, is a bit incongruous, he really doesn't care. And if an interviewer find it a bit difficult to compete with the paper airplane for his attention, he doesn't care either. Publicity comes and goes, but aviation is here to stay.

In action before the cameras, there is nothing supercilious about Sanders but his face, which was built for it. Strangely enough, he is infinitely patient with the lesser talent of those he is working with. Possessed of what is probably the most perfect sense of timing in the business, he will unprotestingly rehearse and rehearse again, while some bit player strives to make action and dialogue come out even.

He has a totally out-of-character giggle, a high-pitched indication of mirth which never fails to surprise, coming as it does out of a perpetually dignified countenance. It is most apt to occur when the patience of others is wearing a bit thin. A perfectionist, he has nothing but good humor for anyone trying to improve a picture.

In "Appointment in Berlin," he plays a Lord Haw-Haw with a reverse twist. That is, his traitorous actions turn out to be for Britain's honor, and his broadcasts are really code messages from Berlin to London. All of which is a cunning arrangement, since it allows his fans to hate him and love him at the same time.

During the course of the reels, he gets himself arrested by some well-deceived British Intelligence officers. In the making of this particular scene, a bit player was required to rush in and slap handcuffs on the star's wrists. Again and again the player burst through the door in true Scotland Yard fashion, whipped out the steel bracelets, but each time something seemed to get in the way of the clamps.

Finally, Director Al Green grew impatient. "You're not putting mittens on a baby," he snapped. "That last time you acted like you were afraid of hurting George."

HIGHLY ROMANTIC LADY

They'll tell you at MGM about how brainy, how cultured their Miss Garson is. And she is that. But nothing gets her like a love story. When she started working on "Madame Curie," her current film, she read every book on that remarkable woman. But what got Greer were Marie Curie's notes about making jam, notes scribbled in the midst of most scientific reports.

"A womanly woman," sighs Miss Garson, quite unaware that she is also describing herself.

THIS IS MYSELF

BY CLAUDETTE COLBERT

(The Girl on Movieland's Cover)

I REMEMBER:

That thick, sticky library paste we used to have at school, the way some of the kids used to eat it, and how I envied them. I couldn't bring myself to touch the stuff, though sometimes I got it as far as my lips.

The day one of the paste-eaters stabbed me in the arm with a pen. It left a tiny tattoo mark that to this date puzzles me no end, and I make up stories about it.

How I used to adore Rupert Brooke and Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and how my brother made fun of me.

That sick feeling I had when I made my first appearance on the stage. I still get it on opening scenes in pictures or at radio shows, and I hope I never lose it, because I feel it makes for better performances.

I'VE LEARNED:

From my mother—to pay bills when due . . . to shop economically . . . neatness . . . direct thinking . . . a flair for clothes.

From my husband—not to take minor ailments seriously. I used to be petrified if I scratched a finger and it bled, or if I had a sudden pain, but living with my doctor-husband cured me. One reason is because, let me complain even mildly, and he gives me the most dreadful medicines to swallow.

From my brother—to box, wrestle, play soccer. I knew what a half-

"I am proud of my husband and his service to his country," remarks Claudette. And well she might be of Lt. Commander Pressman!

"I'm impressed with the boys at the VACS canteen where I serve," says our own cover girl. (The boys are impressed by her, too, we add.)

"I've learned diplomacy from my directors," says Claudette, who here proves it by beaming on Director Mark Sandwick rather than on actors Ray Milland and Brian Aherne.

Gary Cooper, one of her closest friends, with Claudette Colbert.

"I like snowy hills and everything that relates to skiing," says Claudette. (She doesn't add that she has prizes which prove that she is one of the best women skiers in America—but this is true.)

Nelson was before I could read well. I don't know how I happened to grow up feminine with that training. That I'm a good athlete today is a matter of sheer survival.

From my directors—diplomacy. A director is boss, so you develop diplomatic methods of evading orders. Directors are clever men—they know about diplomacy, too, and if you can get your way by indirection while they're using the same tactics on you, you're good.

To listen to men's opinions of other women and check up on myself.

I'M GRATEFUL:

That I saw so many places on this earth before war touched them.

That I took my round-the-world trip to China, Java, the South Seas, Indo-China, Bali, Egypt, The Balkans. Prague, and Paris while they were at peace. I was just embarking on my movie career at the time, and everyone advised me against leaving it. I'm glad I didn't listen.

That I can work at an absorbing profession—and I enjoy paying my taxes. I really do!

That people will give to Navy Relief, Red Cross, USO and so on, or buy war stamps and bonds when I urge them from Hollywood Victory Caravans or elsewhere.

That I belong to a country pledged to the Four Freedoms.

A PRETTY girl, a handsome boy, a summer day, a canoe for two. Portrait of a world that used to be and of the world that will be restored to us with victory . . . but a world which right now exists very little outside of movies! It's the American way of living we all loved, and you'll see a glimpse of it in 20th Century-Fox's "Happy Land." The dreamy pair are Dick Crane, new but wow, and Ann Rutherford, who is continually luscious.

In Junction City, Gene couldn't buy a stove for her kitchen, had to rent this one for four dollars a month.

When her husband, Oleg Cassini, stationed at Fort Riley, can't be with her, Gene amuses herself on picnics with some of the other wives.

A STAR, THE STORK, AND THE ARMY

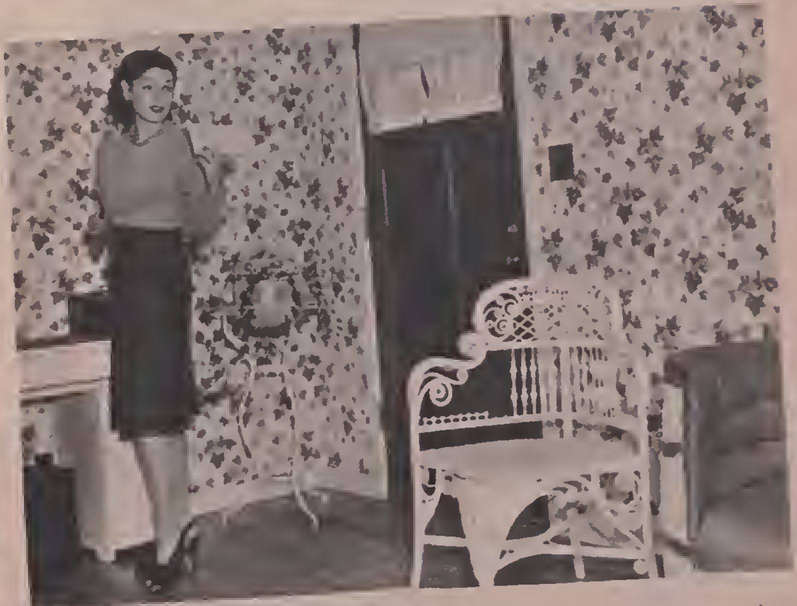
GENE TIERNEY MOVES NEAR ARMY-POST TO BE NEAR HUSBAND AT BLESSED-EVENT TIME

Glamour with a dust-mop. Gene couldn't find any carpeting in town, but is still hunting. The desk, unpainted, cost five dollars. Finding an old washstand bowl and birdcage, Gene piled one on the other, painted them white, planted ivy. Total cost—five dollars. At top, she does her own marketing just as any proper young wife should these days, and, right, she stirs up the victory vegetables.

Gene does the hick trick and loves it—goes down to watch the trains come in. Another army wife and Gene's friend, the wife of Colonel Snider of Fort Riley, accompanies her.

Gene and Oleg at their Junction City home. They're sitting on a love seat which Gene got second-hand for four dollars, painted white, and upholstered in cyclamen rayon taffeta.

By way of contrast, compare this shot of Gene in her exquisite bedroom in Hollywood, which room is nearly as large as the whole Junction City house.



The local furniture stores being almost all sold out, Gene determined to make her own. In this living room, the chair at the right is merely the old barrel which was used to ship Gene's things out to her. Covered with scarlet cotton, the barrel painted white . . . there! Gene did her own painting on that, just as she did on the second-hand wicker chair you see in the corner.

Joan Crawford says, "I belong to the 'Adopt a Pilot Club.'" (Incidentally, see her in "Night Shift.")

But have you heard about Joan's work with the "Adopt a Pilot Club"? She is one of the directors of the organization, along with Jack L. Warner, Chester Morris, James Gleason, Max M. Gilford, and Frank Borzage.

Many men want to become air cadets; and also how badly our country needs men in the air force! But the standards for the service are high; and often men have to be rejected who are qualified in every way except for some small physical defect.

Here is where Joan Crawford and her fellow directors and members of the "Adopt a Pilot Club" step in. Often the cadet who has been rejected for a small physical defect could have it corrected if he only had the funds to pay for a minor operation. The "Adopt a Pilot Club" takes over the financial responsibility. It costs the young man nothing, and soon he is able to serve his country. His case is handled with no embarrassment or red tape. If hospitalization is necessary, the club pays for it.

Each member of the club donates one hundred dollars. Sometimes it takes less than the hundred to put the boy in perfect physical condition. Then the balance of the hundred is applied to another case.

Judy Garland says, "I have a clothes pool."

No complaints about restrictions in wartime, from Judy, who's newest picture is "Girl Crazy."

When she and her two sisters were very poor (during those early vaudeville days when they were known as the Gumm Sisters), by necessity they started a clothes pool, and constantly shared each other's clothes.

So Judy dreamed of the day she would have her own exquisite individual clothes, and never have to borrow any.

And the dream came true.

Then came the War.

Judy can still afford to have her own beautiful individual clothes. But . . . today she and her mother and her two sisters are living in the same house; and she and her sisters once again have a clothes pool. By sharing each other's clothes, they know they are conserving the materials and the labor that go into the making of fine garments.

Jimmy Gleason says, "I recruit for the Navy."

When he was sixteen, during the First World War, Jimmy Gleason lied about his age and joined the Army. He fought through the Philippine insurrection, rising from a trumpeter to top sergeant.

When World War II came along, Jimmy, though over-age, was eager to get into the fray. Again and again he was turned down. When he appeared in "Crash Dive," he met many naval officers at the submarine base in New London, and became very eager to join the Navy submarine service. He pulled every string he could, but it was no dice.

But Jimmy became so interested in the Navy that he learned everything he could about it. Then whenever he met a young fellow who seemed undecided about what he wanted to do in the War, Jimmy would start telling him about the Navy. He knew all the answers. And his enthusiasm caused hundreds of young men to enlist.

Today, whenever he has any spare time, Jimmy can be found in the Beverly Hills U. S. Navy recruiting office. Although he can't officially be in the Navy, the Navy is glad to have Jimmy's help in recruiting the young men who can join up.

WINNING THE WAR

Ida Lupino, who's appearing in "Devotion," says, "I collect recipes for chicken."

Ida Lupino's home dinners for servicemen have long been famous. Rationing or no rationing . . . because Ida knows how much home hospitality means to men far from home.

Because of the War, Ida has no servants at the present time. She, her mother, and her sister take care of all the work at home. And just what could the three women do to make sure that the men would enjoy their meals at the Lupino menage?

It was easy to solve part of the problem. Excellent salads could be served, using vegetables and herbs grown in Ida's own Victory Garden. But what about meat?

Ida decided that chicken was the answer. But she didn't want to serve chicken prepared in exactly the same way night after night and week after week. So she started collecting recipes for different ways of preparing chicken. She read cookbooks; asked all her friends for their favorite chicken recipes; and did some home experimenting. To date, she has collected forty-six different recipes for preparing chicken. Of them all, the favorite with the men is, she believes, old-fashioned fried chicken. We wish we had space to give her recipe for corn oysters which she serves with it.

Joan Blondell says, "I have my old clothes made over."

"In order to help out on the home front," says Joan Blondell, whom you'll see next in "Cry Havoc," "I try to make my wardrobe last as long as possible. That means having my old clothes made over. First I plan just what I want done to my old clothes to make them look as up-to-date as possible. Then I bring the designs to a seamstress, who works out a new wardrobe for me.

"Here is an example of how the clothes-conserving plan works. One day I noticed a formal suit of my husband's (Dick Powell). He hadn't worn it for months.

"'I think your formal suit could be made over into a cocktail suit for me,' I told Dick. 'Do you think you'll have an occasion to use it these war days, or will it be all right for me to have it made over?'

"Dick was sure he'd have no further opportunity to wear it, so I took the suit to my seamstress. She did such a fine job that Dick took me out dancing the first time I wore the costume."

Walter Reed says, "I helped the sheriff's office."

You saw him win Anne Shirley in "Bombardier," and now he is in the Army; but when he first wanted to get in, he was turned down because of a knee injury. When he thought that he might be kept from the fighting fronts, he looked up work on the home front.

"Because of the War," he said, "I discovered that there was a shortage of deputy sheriffs, and so . . ."

Long after his day's work at the studio, a phone call would sometimes come in to the effect that someone was creating a public disturbance in Hollywood or some other section of Los Angeles. Then Walter would rush down to the street where the riot or disturbance was taking place and do everything he could to stop it. Sometimes he was called upon to help on raids of places guilty of selling liquor to minors. And sometimes he had to deliver prisoners to the sheriff's office.

One day he had to go to a nearby town in order to arrest two men and bring them to Los Angeles for trial. As Walter Reed walked into their apartment and told them why he was there, they gaped at the actor.

"I never thought," one of them said with something like awe in his voice, "that I would be taken to jail shackled to a movie star."

Jimmy Ellison, who's appearing with Alice Faye in "The Gang's All Here," says, "I act as manager of a boat building company."

George Peters, owner of the Ackerman Boat Building Company in Balboa, California, and Jimmy Ellison, the star, have been friends for years.

One evening Mr. Peters was having dinner with the Ellisons. "I wish I could do something in my spare time to help the War effort," Jimmy said. "Of course, there are camp tours, and I've gone on those; but that seems such a small contribution to make. I'd like to do something else, too."

"It would certainly be wonderful for me if I had someone like you to act as foreman and manager of my place," said Mr. Peters.

"Are you kidding?" said Jimmy. "You know I've had no experience."

Mr. Peters was decidedly not kidding. He was loaded with orders to turn out boats for the Navy and the Merchant Marine; and he was having a terrible time because of the shortage of men.

"If you could use a man as green as I, I'd be very happy to undertake the job the minute I get a lay-off from 20th Century-Fox. Of course, I couldn't accept any salary, because I'm under contract to the studio."

And so last February Jimmy Ellison began acting as foreman at the boat company in Balboa. Whenever he was between pictures, he donated all his time to this work. When he was acting in a picture, he would come down to the company after shooting and work nights.

Barbara Stanwyck, who is appearing in "For All We know," says, "I give the boys identification bracelets."

In addition to sending long personal letters in her own handwriting to each of the grips, electricians, and prop boys she met at the studios and who are now in service, Barbara also sends them a heavy sterling silver identification bracelet. Inscribed inside each bracelet is the famous quotation from Hugh Walpole. "It isn't life that matters; it's the courage you bring to it."

Because the message comes from Barbara Stanwyck, whose own life is a saga of courage, that inscription is special inspiration to the men who receive it. Many of them have found renewed courage and a new philosophy of life as a result.

Elyse Knox, whom you'll see in "Hi' ya Sailor," says, "I went to cannery school."

"You know how you keep reading that you should can your own fruits and vegetables," says Elyse Knox. "Then you get scared because you also read about people who became ill through improperly canned foods.

"I have my own Victory Garden, and so I decided it was my job to learn the latest, most authoritative methods for home canning. I went to a cannery school, where I was cautioned not to attempt to do any oven canning. I learned that two methods of preserving all vegetables except tomatoes are approved by authorities —pressure canning and dehydration. For canning fruits, tomatoes and rhubarb, pressure canning and the boiling-water bath are approved.

"By the time I had finished my course, I knew that I could can all vegetables and fruits without running any risk of food spoilage.

"We know how important food is in helping win the war. Rationing is one way of distributing the food supply fairly to everyone. But the less canned food we have to buy, the more there is to go around.

"The government has encouraged all of us who can do so to have Victory Gardens. That's grand; but by learning how to can properly, we make sure that the products of our Victory Gardens are available for months to come."

Ann Shirley, the girl in "Government Girl," says, "I write letters."

She dances with the boys regularly at the Hollywood Canteen. While working there, Anne got the idea of another very personal way in which she could help the boys away from home.

Now when a man in the services doesn't know exactly how to phrase a letter to his best girl, his wife, mother, or sister, he can count on Anne to help him. If necessary, she'll write the letter for him, if he'll only give her an idea of what he wants said.

The saddest and hardest letter Anne ever had to write was for a Marine who had returned from Guadalcanal. In the fighting there he had lost several fingers.

"I feel I'll be a wreck the rest of my life," he told Anne. "Will you write a letter for me to my fiancee, telling her that I want to release her from our engagement? She's young and beautiful; it wouldn't be fair to keep her tied to me."

"You should go home first," Anne said. "Let the girl decide for herself what she wants to do. In the meanwhile, if you want me to, I'll write her a letter."

The man nodded. No part that Anne will ever have to play on the screen will seem so difficult to her as the writing of that letter. The Marine had begged her to be careful not to worry the girl he loved; and yet at the same time he wanted her prepared for the change in him.

But Anne wrote it. And she was almost as happy as the boy himself when she later learned that everything has turned out perfectly for him and his girl.

Roy Rogers says, "I train pigeons."

Before the War, training pigeons was simply a hobby with Roy Rogers, Republic's "King of the Cowboys," appearing in "Hands Across the Border," but with the coming of the War, he saw a way of making his hobby serve the country. So he asked the government whether it could use some of his trained pigeons. Officials said yes; and since then Roy has been training pigeons for Uncle Sam. The pigeons are timed; and the fastest ones are turned over to the Army for such important duties as carrying messages.

"I believe pigeons have souls," says Roy. "No matter how badly wounded or hurt they are, they always come home."

Linda Darnell, next to be seen in "Buffalo Bill" —and that's husband Pev Marley you see with her—says, "I am a Volunteer hospital worker."

"I'll do anything," Linda Darnell said to the startled authorities at St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica, "anything at all to help, including washing bedpans.

"I know there's a shortage of nurses. But because I'm in pictures, I haven't had the time to train for nursing. But surely there must be something that I can do, even though I've had no training. Can't you use me somewhere?"

The head nurse smiled. "Yes, we could. We could use someone in the delivery room. But it's no soft job. It's hard work; and you'll have to see pain and suffering. Do you think you could take it?"

Her eyes said the words that she withheld . . . And so the nurse told her when and where to report.

Linda began the job that was really drudgery, but drudgery which could lift up the human spirits to the heights. Her slender hands carefully sterilized the doctor's instruments; she sterilized the gloves and gowns, and saw that everything the doctors needed was close at hand. She carted out the soiled linens and helped in every way she could.

She is a regular Volunteer hospital worker now, working every morning that she is not actually before the cameras.

She's Known (After Five Names) as Dona Drake, and She Doesn't Even Understand Herself

BY

BARRY STARR

THIS is the story of a motion picture actress, a gasoline A-card and sixty-five cats. It is utterly fantastic. The A-card is strictly plebian.

The story is about Dona Drake, the young lady with five names ("But only one 'N'!"), the young lady you saw briefly but effectively in "Road to Morocco" and "Star Spangled Rhythm." This story is intended to reveal why she rides a bus to and from her work at Paramount studio.

Miss Drake, who has been earning her own living since she was thirteen, and has never been known to be helpless about anything, surprisingly presents a mother complex whenever she runs across anything even slightly woebegone. One of her passions is cats. She has two, not sixty-five, it might as well be revealed here. The sixty-five come later.

Dona, who lives in Hollywood, was in Los Angeles recently on business. Her A-card dutifully couched in her purse, she had driven to town. Before she had a chance to get started on whatever she came to town for, she was a Victim of Circumstance. She saw a gray haired and completely bewildered elderly lady. Dona swung into action, as only Dona can.

It developed that the elderly lady lived in Santa Monica, which is some twenty or twenty-five miles from Los Angeles. She had sixty-five cats. She had walked to her neighborhood store to buy cat food. There was none. She had come to the big stores in Los Angeles on the interurban. She still couldn't find any cat food. And those sixty-five cats were probably on the verge of starvation. Most of them belonged to men in service and women in war plants, and the elderly lady had taken them in as a sort of Sacred Trust.

Well, if you know Dona Drake, you know what happened. She loaded the lady into her automobile, and they scoured the city. They bought all the cat food they could find, and it wasn't much, but it would do.

After which Dona drove her unexpected guest all the way back to Santa Monica to see the cats, using up the tickets in her A-book as fast as she could.

So the cats got fed, and Dona is riding a bus to work, and is worrying herself into a state as to whether they're getting fed regularly. As soon as she gets a day off, she's going down to Santa Monica . . . on a street car . . . and find out.

Which ought to give you an idea of what to expect when you see Dona Drake in person. And you'd be totally wrong. There's nothing motherly-looking in the slightest degree about Miss Drake. She's surprisingly tiny, has hair that is violently black and eyes that are snapping brown. Her nose is so small it is sometimes hard to locate

ONCE again MOVIELAND was the only one on the spot with camera and flashbulbs. And look who showed up that night at the Trocadero! The Chaplins—three of them. Mrs. (Oona O'Neill) Chaplin the Fourth . . . Mr. Charles Chaplin, Senior . . . and Mr. Charles Chaplin, Junior. Incidentally, Charles, Jr., the son of Lita Grey Chaplin, is also eighteen years old, the same as his new step-mama.

Several years back Olivia arrived in Hollywood. Remember this little girl at the right?

CLOSE-UP OF OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND

BY J. M. WALDECK

"CHANGED? Of course she's changed," said the guy on the phone. "You won't know her."

"For that matter, she may not know you. What I mean is, she's a star and she acts like one."

"Hard to handle, then?" this correspondent asked.

"I said she acts like a star."

"Maybe she's just unhappy," I suggested.

"Nuts," said the guy on the phone.

This correspondent sat there brooding for awhile. What a pity, as Herbert Wilcox would say. What a bloody pity. Such a dear, cooperative girl.

WE remembered a night in 1934 in the Hollywood Bowl. A warm, still night, with the stars hanging low and the good clean exhaust smell drifting up from Cahuenga Boulevard and all the beautiful dames in fur coats they didn't need, trudging up the hill.

Max Reinhardt was opening his production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" that night. Shakespeare wrote "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Shakespeare was dead, but people still read him and talked about him and stole his plots, and if you wanted to be anybody in Hollywood, you had to know what sort of stuff he wrote. Anyway there was a cute little boy in the show named Mickey Rooney. And there was a torchlight procession. If the play was dull, the torchlight procession would be worth all the hardships you suffered getting into the place. Who designed it anyway? Imagine making you park your Cadillac two blocks down hill—the ignominy of it!

We were there not because we liked Shakespeare. It was a hot night and somebody had handed us a pass and besides we had heard that Gloria Stuart was playing Hermia in the show, and we were very fond of Gloria Stuart. We (Continued on page 72)

ERROL FLYNN TODAY

Errol and the girl who at first was known to the reporters just as "Beautiful" until they found out her name was Nora Eddington.

BY BARRY STARR

SINCE the day when he first landed in Hollywood, Errol Flynn has been the possessor of an uncanny, and sometimes unfortunate, habit of getting his name into headlines.

It started with the violent, noisy, and awesome spats he had with Lili Damita, then his wife, and the scores of partings and reconciliations they had until they actually did obtain their divorce. It was brought up to date in mid-August when wild rumors of a marriage with the girl he has been dating for the past several months, Nora Eddington, came soaring out of Mexico. This was followed hastily with denials from Flynn that sounded somewhat pained in a "why don't they lay off me?" manner.

In between have been rows with columnists, fights in night clubs, wounds in the Spanish Civil War, the brutally frank court action involving Peggy Satterlee and Betty Hansen—this and assorted other calamities that caused editors in some cases to keep "FLYNN" all set up in type, and nice and handy, just in case. The cases frequently happened, sometimes through Flynn's own efforts, and sometimes when he was merely an innocent bystander.

Indications today are, however, that all this is going to be changed. The editors can, regretfully, put their set-up type back in their cases. Errol is going in for the quiet life, the soft word and the velvet glove.

His friends first noticed this during the filming of his latest motion picture for Warner Bros., "Northern Pursuit." Errol was strictly business at all times. True to the Flynn of the past, it must be admitted he did his usual debonnaire promising of interviews that he never quite got time to give. He harried his publicity department who begged for a photographic sitting—but finally gave in and sat for one that was a lulu. In fact, Errol did three jobs at once and worked hard at each. He acted in one picture, plotted a second with Director Raoul Walsh, and put finishing touches on a new book, his second.

Errol worked long hours at home on his book, making revisions in the manuscript that already had been accepted for publication. It may be called "Charlie Bow-Tie Comes to America," but no title has definitely been selected. Unlike his first, "Beam Ends," which was semi autobiographical, the new volume, says Flynn, is strictly fictional. However, those who have had an advance peak at it insist a number of Hollywood celebrities will find themselves satirically and brilliantly limned.

While he still goes to night clubs, it is not as frequently as he has gone in the past. He also goes home earlier. There are several reasons for this, the most important of which is the fact that he had been repeatedly turned down by all branches of the armed services. His health is not good. Many an athlete knows what it means to have "athlete's heart." Errol, an Olympic winner, knows this disaster, too.

Yet the change in him goes even beyond the necessary guarding of his health. His approach to his work is changing. His next picture, "Uncertain Glory," is the story that the star personally selected for himself. There isn't a swashbuckle in it, and a bare hint of romance. No dashing adventures as in "Robin Hood" and "Captain Blood." No sword play, no elopements, no super-heroics. Just a simple, moving story of a nonentity who seizes one moment in an obscure life to atone for his sins. Very un-Flynnish . . . but Errol picked it out himself.

"All of a sudden," one of Errol's most intimate friends remarked, "Errol has grown up."

This seems to be true, and (Continued on page 90)

"STEP THIS WAY, FOLKS!"

Orson Welles, the sensational, the stupendous, is at it again. This time he mystifies you with locked trunk magic. Right inside the tent. There's room for three hundred people. Of course if you're a civilian, you have your choice of only fifty-odd seats on sale at $5.50 apiece. Mr. Welles is financing the whole show, but if there are any profits, he's going to turn them over to Ann Lehr's Hollywood Guild Canteen, where, you know, service boys can sleep free of charge. So come on in and look at the show.

Above—Through the tent rides Joe Cotten, pretending to be a messenger boy. He delivers a fake, gag telegram to Orson, who signs for the thing.

Above—Orson introduces Rita to the audience. And the service boys whistle like mad.

Right—Rita disappears, comes back dressed just like Cotten, except in white instead of black. Service boys tie ropes around her throat to tie her down or pull her head off.

Comes the trunk on to the stage. Joe gets into it—also into a bag which is tied over him. The trunk is sealed, tied, strapped by service lads. The whole thing is in full view of the audience. All the time, the boys are tugging on Rita's ropes. The lights go off for one second, then on again.

Right—Much knocking on supposedly empty trunk. Surprise! There's Joe also in said trunk. (The confetti is for applause. Orson tossed it out after each trick, telling the audience that it meant he wanted applause . . . and he always got it. Yes, there were other tricks.)

The Chet Morrises. Chet, who is a good magicion himself, gives a look at Mr. Welles, and he seems to be mystified.

Among those present at the Orson Welles' show—Jack Oakie and June Havoc turn around in their seats to say hello to Nat Dallinger's camera.

Mrs. Nina Garson, Greer Garson, and Mrs. L. B. Mayer discuss the haws of the trunk act. How did Rita get into the thing?!

Georgie Jessel and June Lang were alsa among the first nighters. Rita Hayworth, by the way, appeared at the opening night . . . and she will be back as soon as she finishes her picture, "Cover Girl."

And maybe Martha Raye thinks she knows how he does it. At least she's giving same explanation to actor Sid Gould.

THE THREE WOMEN IN Dana Andrews' LIFE

BY DORA ALBERT

All three loved him. He loved all three—but his mother-in-law influenced him most.

REMEMBER the Georgia boy in "Swamp Water?" And the fellow who lost Anne Baxter to Tyrone Power in "Crash Dive?" Remember the young idealistic husband who was lynched in "The Oxbow Incident?"

They were all the same actor, Dana Andrews. You'll be seeing him next as a serious heroic Russian bombardier in "North Star" and in a comedy role in "Up In Arms." Twentieth Century-Fox and Samuel Goldwyn think so much of him that his contract is shared between them, and Dana has been going rapidly from one picture to another with hardly a day's rest in between them.

Today, in other words, Dana is on his way to stardom. Yet, if it hadn't been for three women, he probably wouldn't be in pictures at all. He might not have been working at all. In any event, he would have been a rolling stone.

"There was a time when I thought," Andrews says, "that nothing could be more wonderful than to wander from place to place, never settling down, never taking a job except when the spur of necessity drove me, and then working for only a few days."

To understand Dana's story, you really have to go back to the home in which he was brought up. Born in a small town in Mississippi, he was the son of a minister, one of nine children.

His mother used to say that no matter what happened, she was not going to worry about any of the children. This was a fortunate decision on her part since, true to the tradition that there is a black sheep in every minister's family, Dana was destined to be the disturbing element in the family of the Reverend Charles Forrest Andrews.

He was always the leader in the wildest exploits at school. Whenever there was mischief afoot, he was part of it. There was the time when he and his friends broke into the schoolhouse after hours, took down all the fire extinguishers, and put on the battle of the century, using the fire extinguishers as water guns.

On another occasion there was the exploit of the donkey and the buggy. Again Dana and his band stole into the school after hours, taking a donkey up the fire escape and into the school auditorium. With remarkable ingenuity, they also completely dismantled a buggy, and once inside the auditorium, put it back together again, hitching the donkey to it.

When the principal and the teachers the next day discovered the donkey and the buggy in the school auditorium, they thought they were in a collective nightmare. Lest the school routine be completely disrupted, the authorities decided they had to get the donkey out of the auditorium immediately. However, they lacked the ingenuity of Dana and his companions. It took them three days to clear the room.

Generally, Dana got away with his pranks. Once he and two other boys were kept after school for a month because they were accused of having stolen some chemical apparatus. On this particular occasion Dana was innocent; but he took his punishment, philosophically, figuring that he had escaped chastisement for many pranks of which he was guilty.

His father was not aware of all Dana's pranks; but when he learned of any of them, he dealt with the boy severely. He was very much displeased when instead of going to prayer meeting on Wednesday nights, Dana would sneak into a movie. On these occasions, Dana always underwent a severe tussle with his own conscience. He knew that his father wanted him to go to prayer meeting and would not approve his going elsewhere; but on the other hand, the movies fascinated him.

When Dana yielded to such temptation, his father would say, "Well, son, you know that you must be punished."

Then he went systematically about the routine of it. He would take a razor strap or a belt, and the blows would fall. Dana took it . . . and kept on going to the movies.

Like most minister's families, the Andrews moved frequently. When Dana was about fifteen, the family was living in Huntsville, Texas. Dana still had no clear idea of what he wanted to do with his life.

Dana and Michael pose with Mary, who gave up big hopes of a movie career to become Mrs. Dana Andrews.

Across the page—Have you seen Dana—not with his dog, Michael, of course—in "Crash Dive" or in "North Star?"

There was a time when Dana filled them up at a gas station—before the movie people took an interest in him.

He took a job in the bank for the time being. He liked the feeling of being financially independent. When his father got a call to go to a new parish, Dana surprised his family by saying he wanted to stay in Huntsville; maybe go on to high school and college.

For there were then and still are two Dana Andrews; two personalities within the same fellow. One was the restless adventurer who wanted to hoot at responsibilities; the other was the boy who dreamed of becoming someone.

His father let him remain in Huntsville. Dana shifted from one job to another. For a time he worked as a clerk; then in an oil mill; then as cashier in a movie house, and later as an accountant with the Gulf Oil Company in Houston and for Tobin's in Austin.

He was growing up, but (Continued on page 80)

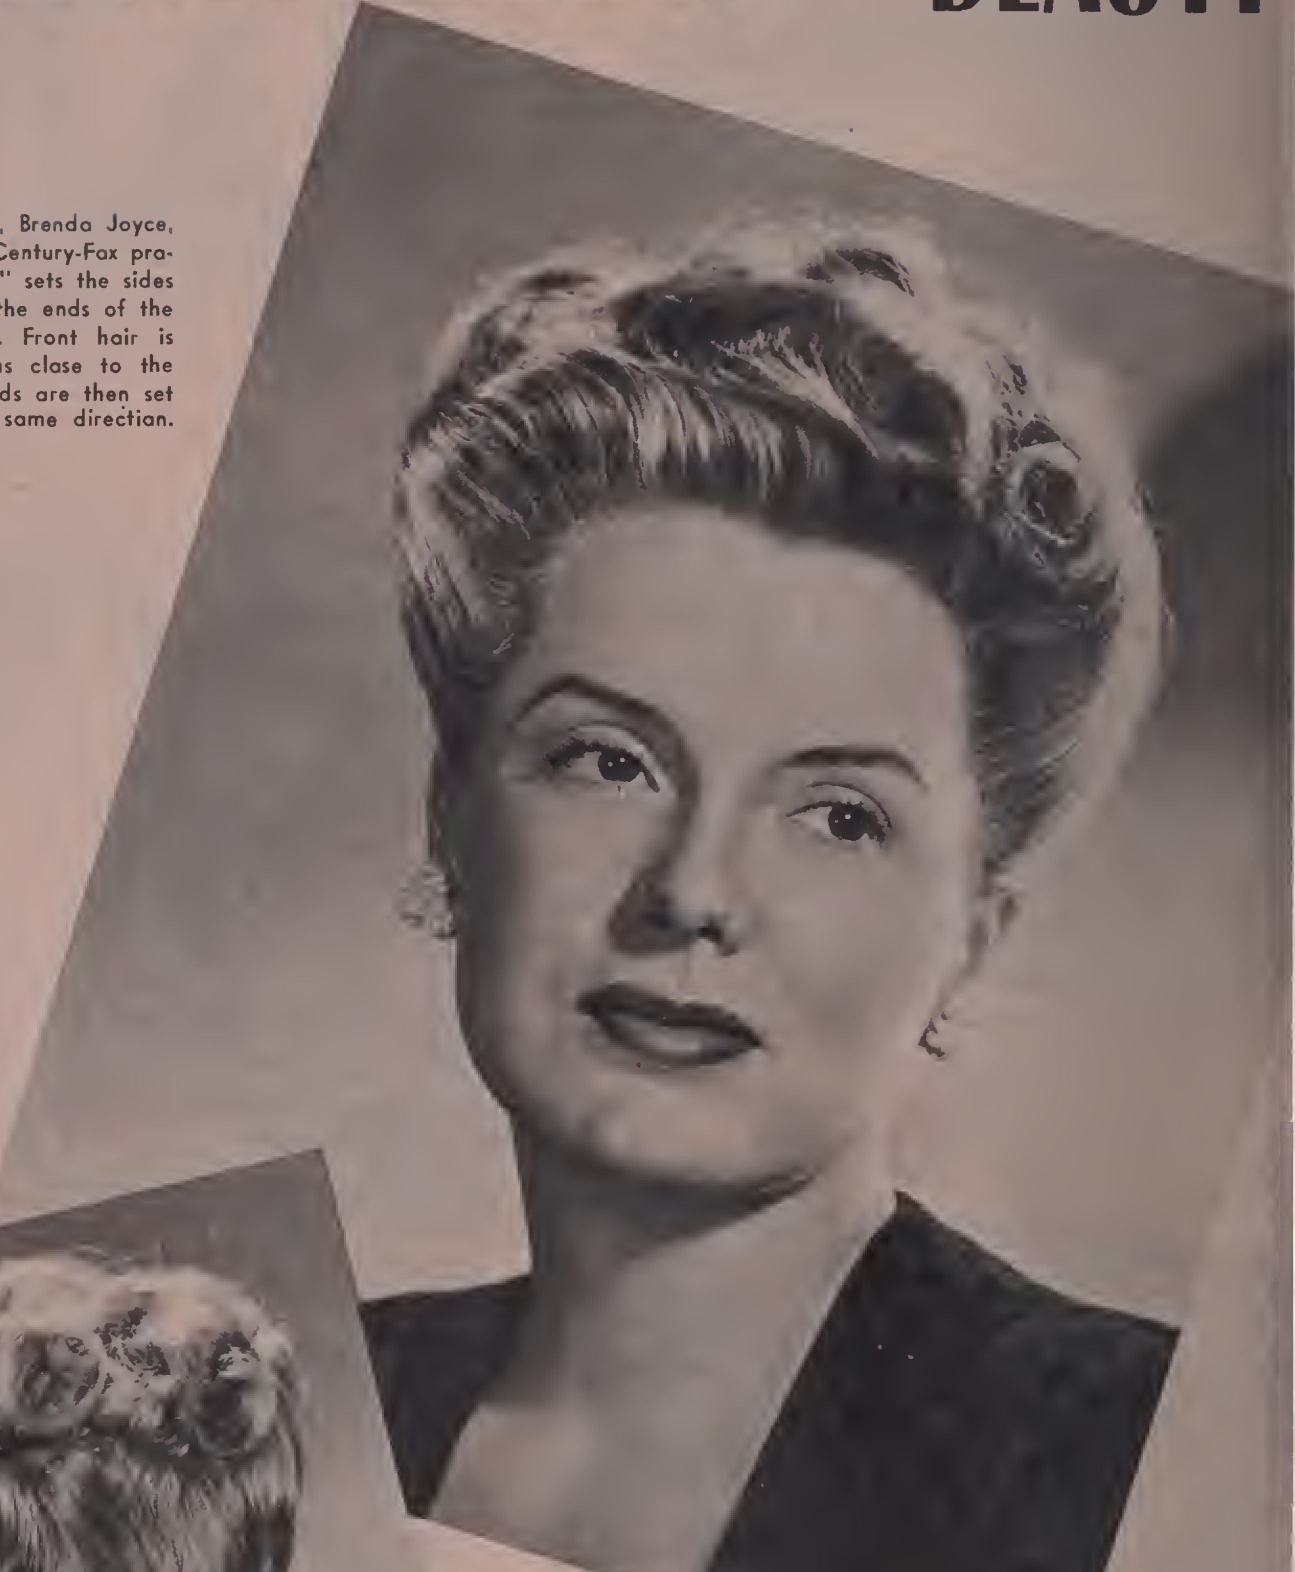
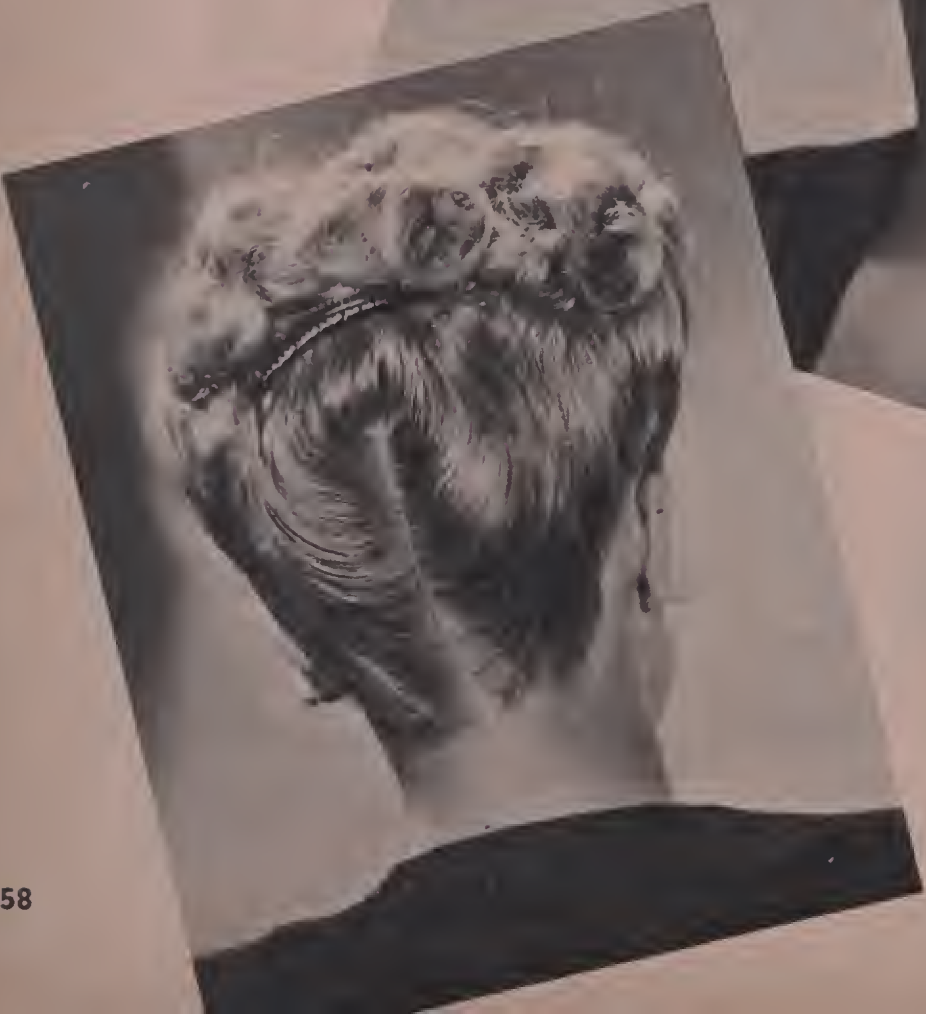
Movieland's BEAUTY

Far this smort, feminine style, Brenda Joyce, next ta be seen in the 20th Century-Fax praductian, "Guadalçanal Diory," sets the sides of her hair in flat pincurls, the ends of the back hair in large pincurls. Front hair is pushed inta a half wave, as clase to the fareheadline as possible. Ends are then set in pincurls, all gaing in the same directian.





In the actual dressing aperation, Brenda uses a half-part at the center back af her head, brushing all the hair upward and ta the frant. A camb helps ta keep it smaath and sleek.

PARLOR

NOW that we are really settled into fall, with a few formal dates to be thought about, even in wartime, we all get the urge to be up and doing in the months to come.

But what a beauty recovery this takes!

Down in red ink should go those persistent freckles . . . the wrinkles, non-existent before, brought about by drying qualities of summer sun, wind, salt water . . . your brittle, sun-bleached hair.

Freckles you can battle with that simple and old standby, pure lemon juice. Its bleaching qualities are safe and certain. Just paint the annoying little spots with it daily, allowing the lemon juice to remain on for fifteen minutes. Two weeks of this routine should do the work.

To get that tired face of yours back into shape, there's just one answer: lubrication. You're a smart girl if you hie yourself to a beauty parlor for a few facials. It's the surest way to quick results and making yourself feel glamorous and irresistible.

Watch that transition from tan to snowy white, and choose your foundation creams to cover the in-between stages. Nothing is more ghastly than a too-light foundation over a dark skin, or a too-dark foundation over a light skin. Either way you're apt to come out looking like a mottled egg.

Your well bleached hair may be just too, too utterly devastating in winter, and a great success. But that same bleached hair looks decidedly overdone after a summer in the sun.

We know it's fun to have gone without turbans and hats, and to have felt sun and wind on and in your hair. But don't go around now that winter's coming howling that your hair looks awful, that it's ten different shades, that it's dry and the ends are breaking, and expecting all that talk in some obscure manner to whip your scalp and hair into glorious shape. It just isn't being done this or any other season. It's up to you to provide the reconditioning necessary for a cure.

Why not start with a restyling cut? You're probably tired anyway of the way your hair has been styled, and the cutting is an easy and quick method of getting rid of those troublesome broken ends.

If your hair is bleached or tinted, it's very wise to consult your beauty parlor girl to find out just what her opinion is on the amount of reconditioning needed before you have another bleach or tint.

If you've got coins that jingle-jangle-jingle, and if you have the time, the easiest and most luxurious way to recondition hair and scalp for fall and winter is through a series of scalp treatments given by a competent operator.

A series of hot oil treatments at home, including plenty of personal scalp manipulation, will do the trick—if you have the patience. We gave you the directions on this last month, remember?

Above all, don't forget to brush and brush.

If you're a home shampooer, by all means use a liquid soap. It is more effective, handles more readily, and rinses away more easily. Remember, too, that too little and improper rinsing of the hair by home shampooers is one of the most prevalent causes of dull and lifeless hair.

If you are a natural blonde or have bleached hair, by all means use a lemon rinse. If you have brown or dark hair, use a vinegar rinse.

And now for a new hair-style.

We chose as one of our favorites this lovely up-do sponsored by Brenda Joyce. It's our choice because of its (Continued on page 88)

No time goes

Actually under contract to Warner Bros. where her next film will be "This Is the Army," Joan was loaned to RKO as Fred Astaire's partner.

THERE is a very small, very morose, and very lonely wire-haired dog in Hollywood these days. His days are dreary, and his nights are long. He says so.

You don't think dogs can say these things? Then you don't know Mike. He says things with his eyes. Right out in Hollywood, which is full of eyes which say all kinds of enticing and inviting things. Mike has eyes which tell only of sadness.

Mike is the property of Joan Leslie, which ought to be enough to gladden the heart of any dog, but Mike is the acme of loneliness. Things, says Mike, aren't what they used to be.

The pert Miss Leslie has attained screen stardom. That is important to a number of people, not the least of whom is Miss Leslie herself. But it is anathema to Mike. He is forced to console himself with his memories.

During the period of the Battered Sedan, Mike, who is now at the venerable dog age of seven, found it great sport to huddle in the back seat of a dilapidated car with Joan, Mary, and Betty. They were the three little sisters, but not the three little sisters that people sing about. Joan, Mary, and Betty were a vaudeville act, and they were touring the South.

The inception of the act had taken place way back in the unlamented early '30's. Just previous to that, Papa Brodel had been an accountant and an amateur baseball player. Mama Brodel was a pianist with a determination that each of the three little Brodels should learn to play a musical instrument. Mary was proficient on a saxophone, Betty coaxed music out of a banjo, and tiny Joan somehow found strength to hold up an accordion and learn to play it.

The three also took dancing lessons by way of developing grace and posture. So when the stock market came tumbling down around everyone's ears in 1929 and knocked Papa Brodel's ears down along with his job, Mama Brodel, who had always been pretty stagestruck, got the idea of putting the three little girls together in a sister act.

"We were," Joan says, "not good. I suppose, even, we were pretty terrible. We worked around in kiddie shows, but we gradually got good enough that we could get a week at the Detroit Fox every six months or so. And we even got to places like Toledo and Hamtramck now and then. Mostly we worked only during vacations. I actually started with the act when I was three, but I had to drop out for a while, and we really didn't get into real show business until after the depression started."

Well, if you're a proper Joan Leslie follower, you probably know about how the Brodel sisters toured all over the South, went into Canada, landed in New York, worked in night clubs, and finally Joanie got her screen chance. Mike remembers it as a pretty busy and exciting whirl. They drove everywhere; they lived in tents for a time, there were ups and downs, and mostly downs, even after Joan and family first got to Hollywood.

Those, says Mike, were the good old days. His mistress had plenty of time for him. But not now that she has become a star. Joan careens around corners and bolts through doorways. The five-and-ten, which used to count her as a favorite customer, sees her only as a mad whirl at the candy and trinket counters.

She dashes here, zips there, and whizzes to other places. There's her studio work, her school work, her dancing lessons, and singing lessons. There's the Hollywood Canteen, the Beverly Hills U.S.O., the Red Cross, and bond sale tours. There are scripts to study, lessons to learn, interviews to be arranged, and pictures to be taken.

There are letters to be answered, personal appearances to be made, songs to be learned, and radio shows to be broadcast. There are shopping expeditions, fittings, hairdressings. There are exercises and tests and dental appointments and physical examinations.

Joan dotes on it, even if it does have its inconveniences. She's eighteen years old and has never had a date. Too busy. She likes baseball, but has never seen a Coast

She's a creature of moods, real and camera-wise. She can be either the tumble-haired hoyden across the page or a svelte worldly creature like this. Actually, neither one.

The Always Rushing Miss Leslie

League game. Too busy. She loves to romp with Mike, but can't. Too busy.

From the very moment Joan signed with Warner Bros., even before she had worked with Gary Cooper in "Sergeant York" or with Jimmy Cagney in "Yankee Doodle Dandy," she has rushed.

"Who," demanded an exasperated executive at a production meeting one day, "is that red-haired kid who is always running? Every time I see her, she's running."

That was fifteen-year-old Miss Leslie. She's always running. To the studio school, to the set, to a dancing lesson, to lunch—anywhere, but always running.

Just the other day that same executive was driving over Cahuenga Pass. He saw a parked car and beyond it a flying figure. He didn't believe it . . . but you guessed it. It was Miss Leslie, now eighteen and a star, but still running.

"We're out of gas!" she panted when he offered a lift. "I'll be late."

Being late is anathema to Miss Leslie. She spent so many years in vaudeville, when she had to be right on time for the act, that she can't accustom herself to Hollywood's frequently indolent ways. She doesn't take advantage of her stardom, as have some.

"In the first place," says Miss Leslie, "I'm not a star. Oh, I guess you can say I am, in the Hollywood sense. That is, if your studio puts your name ahead of the title of the picture . . . then you're a Hollywood star.

"When I have carried a picture by myself, if I ever do, and if I still get fan mail," says Miss Leslie, "then I will think I'm a real star and that the public has accepted me."

This, in Miss Leslie, is not silly modesty. It is simply good sense. She doesn't think there is such a thing as a modest actor or performer, in the first place.

"Anyone who was completely modest," says eighteen - year - old but completely adult Miss Leslie, "could hardly get in front of a camera and fifty or sixty workers

Fred Astaire says of Joan in "The Sky's the Limit," "She's the finest dancing partner I've had since my sister, Adele." Ginger Rogers, please take note.

This is the off-screen Joan Leslie, still a school girl, here out in an antique shop, for the purposes of her art appreciation course.

and play a love scene. Now, really, could they? Of course not. We're just people who happen to be in a business, and we like to be told when we've done something worth while. Like my neighbor. He's retired, and he's been raising a Victory Garden. He brags about it, and he just loves to be told what a wonderful garden it is. I don't blame him. It is a good garden . . . and he certainly isn't modest about it at all."

That's a pretty long speech for the whizzing Miss Leslie. It came out over an ice cream soda, double dip, at a drug store. Miss Leslie was pausing between dashes hither, thither, and yon to stoke up on her favorite food.

Well, second favorite, probably. Irish stew comes first. She can't cook it. She just eats it. Joanie confesses that she can't cook. Just never learned, and too busy to learn now. But she loves to eat.

Studio officials cautioned her she was getting . . . well, rather plump.

"Poo," said Joan, "that's just little-girl fat. It will come off." and she calmly went ahead with her Irish stews and her sodas, and the fat came off. Maybe that came about through her dancing in "The Hard Way" and "The Sky's the Limit" and "Thank Your Lucky Stars."

For after spending several years in Hollywood, Joan has finally got around to doing what she probably can do best—dancing. She does tap, ballet, ballroom, exhibition—anything you want to name. And does them all well.

Joan's earliest recollections of Hollywood revolve around lessons. She had been signed by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and brought out from New York where she and her sisters had been appearing in the Paradise Club and similar places. Naturally the whole family, Battered Sedan, Mike and all, came along.

Joan went to school with Mickey Rooney, no less. He had, Joan remembers, freckles and a fascinating personality. She had an acute urge to mother him; but conquered it nobly.

And also, there was that day on the set when she was working—in a tiny part—in a Greta Garbo picture. Joan was in her set dressing room with her school teacher, studying, when she was called for a scene.

Joan eagerly and anxiously darted out of the dressing room and ran smack into the Great Garbo.

"Pardon," said the G. G.

"I—I—I'm sorry," stuttered Joan.

Which was the entire conversation, but Joanie still mentions, in an awed voice, that Garbo spoke to her. That, to date, is the most exciting thing that ever happened to her. Film fans who have sighed and thrilled when they saw her kissed by Gary Cooper, Jimmy Cagney, and Dennis Morgan may find this astonishing. They'll be even more astonished that not one of these interesting events rates second. That position is held by Joan's personal presence at a Brooklyn Dodgers-New York Giants baseball game which she saw while she was in New York in connection with a personal appearance with "Sergeant York."

"I," says Joan, "am a baseball fan. Papa used used to play baseball. All of us girls played baseball. There's nothing I like better than to step up to the plate and take my cuts."

That baseball slang should establish the fact that she really means it. But baseball, like everything else, has been eliminated from Joan's career.

She whizzes from picture to picture: from lesson to lesson; from school to school. This pert, sweet-looking Irish lass has an ambition, an intenseness that belies her face. She wants to be the best she possibly can.

That's one reason she spends time seeing pictures over and over again. Not her own pictures, other people's.

She studies Bette Davis and Ida Lupino for intensity; Ingrid Bergman for grace and casualness; Garbo for ease and fluidity. In private she does great impersonations of a number of screen stars. She does a lot of them, for public consumption, too, in "Thank Your Lucky Stars."

"I don't want to copy people," says Joan. "I want to find out how they get their effects, why they're so expert at what they do."

I suspect Joanie of complete honesty except in one thing. That modesty business. She may sound worldly about it, but she is modest. There was the thing the other day in the swimming pool.

Joan loves to swim. Not being a big enough Hollywood star to have a pool of her own—and she probably wouldn't, anyway—she swims in the public playground pool in Griffith Park. While she was idly splashing away, a youngster of slightly more than her age started talking to her. He was, he said, a soldier, stationed at a local camp and but recently transferred from his native mid-West. He was lonesome and wanted to talk. So they talked.

"What do you do?" he said finally. "Go to school or work?"

"Oh," said Joan, "I work in a studio. Warner Brothers."

"Secretary," said the soldier, "or something like that?"

"Yes," said Joan, "something like that."

And they had a wonderful time.

Mike doesn't have to look so sad. He should be out, nose in air, telling his canine pals what a great girl he's got for a mistress. Joan's not too busy to be herself.

Movieland Selects Five "Best" Pictures This Month

THIS IS THE ARMY

(Warner Brothers)

EVERYONE in America knows about "This Is the Army," that all-soldier show which Irving Berlin wrote and organized. Now, everyone can see it for himself in the film version which Warner Brothers has patriotically produced. Every cent of profit will be turned over to the Army Emergency Relief Fund in the most gigantically worthy charity gesture ever made by Hollywood.

No one should miss seeing Irving Berlin's "This Is the Army." It has emotional appeal and inescapable impact. It differs from usual theatrical musical offerings as completely as it transcends them.

For the picture, a story has been added which goes back to World War I and tells how a fictional character named Jerry Jones put together a soldier entertainment that he titled "Yip, Yip, Yaphank." Actually Berlin performed the feat which in the movie is attributed to Jerry Jones.

Twenty years pass, and the sons of these men are called to war. They are the ones, the story tells us, who pitched in to put over "This Is the Army," the musical numbers being photographed exactly as performed on the stage.

Few of the soldier actors are identified in the roles they play. But Hollywood personalities have been recruited to swell their ranks; George Murphy, Lt. Ronald Reagan, Joan Leslie, George Tobias, Alan Hale, and Charles Butterworth. Especial praise for any individual would be out of place considering the anonymity of the real soldiers. But it can be reported that Irving Berlin singing "Oh How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning" in his strange cracked voice steals his own show.

HOLY MATRIMONY

WHAT happens when a crusty, solitude-loving painter assumes the identity . . . and the wife and the affianced of his dead valet . . . is the story of "Holy Matrimony." You may remember the plot which is based on a very funny book Arnold Bennett wrote under the title of "Buried Alive." Its adaptation by Nunnally Johnson, which stars Monty Woolley as the painter, will send you into fits of holy glee.

Of course, the painter has no idea of the existence of either of the ladies when he allows a foolish whim to dictate the masquerade he assumes. He has been absent from his native England for some twenty-five years, the solitude of tropical climes where he can paint undisturbed appealing enormously to him. But he is such a master artist that his King orders his return to be knighted. It is impossible to refuse the honor.

On the way home, his valet contracts pneumonia and dies shortly after landing in England. The doctor confuses the two men and makes out the death certificate in the painter's name. Enabled by this mistake to escape the fame he dreads, the great painter allows the servant to be buried in Westminster Abbey. But he reckons without the women with whom the valet was involved.

Woolley has a role cleverly tailored to his measure and plays it for a solid hit. Gracie Fields is a joy as the patient and understanding woman he marries—a very subdued and very gracious Gracie. Laird Cregar, also sporting a beard, Eric Blore as the valet, Una O'Connor as the first wife, Alan Mowbray as a barrister, and Franklin Pangborn as a greedy cousin add to the fun.

WATCH ON THE RHINE

(Warner Brothers)

IT WAS later than we thought, in 1941. The threat of Fascism seemed very remote to the American way of life, and Hitler and his hordes were merely laughable figures in the newsreels. But to one family living in a gracious ancestral home just outside of Washington came a brave man who had dedicated his life to fighting Fascism. His was the idealism that has since sent all free men out to join in the fight. He stayed with the family only a few short days, yet in that brief time he "shook them out of the magnolias."

This was the substance of Lillian Hellman's intensely moving drama, "Watch on the Rhine." It has lost none of its thoughtful power in being brought to the screen. For the cameras, Paul Lukas repeats his deeply stirring stage portrayal of the Fascism fighter, one of the most admirable performances of our generation in the theatre. Lukas is co-starred with Bette Davis who faultlessly enacts his American-born wife. The role is not so exacting as the usual Davis assignment, but she invests it with ringing sincerity.

Several other members of the original cast appear in the parts they created. Lucile Watson is splendid as Bette's mother, and George Coulouris compelling as the German informer. Eric Roberts as the child, Bodo, also duplicates his stage success. Janis Wilson and Donald Buka are the other children, and there is an arresting part for Geraldine Fitzgerald.

"Watch on the Rhine" is not a war picture in the usual sense such a descriptive phrase is used. The battles it fights are those dictated by conscience. The acting is glorious and the writing superb. Both are guaranteed to make you think.

LASSIE COME HOME

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

LASSIE is a faithful collie who met her young master each day at four o'clock when he got out of school. The storekeepers in the nearby Yorkshire village used to set their clocks by the dog's passing. But the boy's family could not afford to keep Lassie and she was sold to a wealthy duke who wanted to add her to his kennels of show dogs. Lassie didn't like her new home, and twice she ran away to rejoin the boy to whom she was devoted. Even after they took her away to Scotland to train her for shows, she escaped to come back to Yorkshire.

"Lassie Come Home" is the story of the dog's arduous journey of almost a thousand miles to be by the side of her small master. Written by the late Major Eric Knight, it was his favorite story of his own authorship. As magnificently translated to the screen, it will be one of your favorite emotional experiences of the film season. Strangely, the picture has a strong adult appeal.

Roddy McDowall is his splendid self as the boy. His parents are understandingly played by Donald Crisp and Elsa Lanchester. As the elderly folks who befriend Lassie on her travels, appear Dame May Whitty and Ben Webster, a real-life married couple who recently celebrated their golden wedding anniversary in Hollywood. Edmund Gwenn is fine as the peddler whom the dog joins as long as the man's path continues southward. Nigel Bruce is the duke, and pretty Elizabeth Taylor, his tiny granddaughter. The production is handsome in Technicolor, and the collie chosen to play the title role remarkably intelligent. Due care has been taken in the picture not to overstress sentimentalities. The action is always believable.

PHANTOM OF THE OPERA

(Universal)

"PHANTOM OF THE OPERA" will be remembered as one of Lon Chaney's great silent screen successes. It is a very different picture in its 1943 version. In place of the horror scenes by which the master of the macabre frightened his public, a rare musical treat and an arrestingly beautiful spectacle await discriminating picture-goers. Naturally, a phantom still haunts the Paris Opera House, he evades his pursuers in the vast subterranean passageway beneath the stage, and again he sends a chandelier crashing down on the heads of an audience. But we now know who this phantom is and are inclined to be sympathetic toward him.

Claude Rains takes over the title role to project an always understandable study of a man's disintegration. You are permitted to sense, rather than actually to know that the girl singer is his daughter and his protective interest in her career is justified.

Susanna Foster makes a definite bid for stardom in the role of the girl. Singing opposite her is Nelson Eddy. Each is in splendid voice. Their arias and duets are equally outstanding; two original operas having been written for them by Edward Ward. He based a French opera on some of the best-loved themes by Chopin, and a Russian opera on Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. He also wrote the lovely "Lullaby of the Bells," fictionally the folk song and is the theme of the concerto Rains composes.

Because of this fine music, the interesting performances, and the spectacular scope of the production in Technicolor, "Phantom of the Opera" is highly recommended. Its melodrama will hold you; its music will thrill you.

COTTEN IS JUST A GUY CALLED JOE

But he's a special kind of Joe—the kind with high cheekbones and slightly slanted eyes—the kind whose voice does things to women fans—the kind who can rise to heights in four pictures!

BY M. M. RAISON

WHEN Joseph Cotten was handed his present role in "Hers To Hold," his latest picture, someone commented that Cotten was growing younger with every picture.

"Yes," said the actor, "at this rate, I expect my next contract will have to be approved by the court!"

He was referring, naturally, to his first two roles in Hollywood: the garrulous editor who grows old in "Citizen Kane" and the romantic oldster in "Lydia." Then, much to his relief, he was given three roles in which he acted his age: The American agent in "Journey Into Fear," the young bluebeard in "Shadow of a Doubt," and the object of Deanna Durbin's affections in "Hers To Hold."

Despite this rather bewildering shuttling around, in and out of white muff, baggy pants, and gray powder, Joseph Cotten managed to set himself solidly as a star with only four pictures to his credit. This is something of a record in Hollywood, where stars are no longer born overnight. At this writing, Cotten has been offered exactly seven roles and is undecided among three of them.

He can name his own terms, approve his own scripts, create his own working conditions. All this on the strength of four pictures! Without question, there must be something superb about a man who can climb so swiftly.

There are several things superb about him. His acting, for one, his manner for another, and his background. Yet by and large Cotten is known as a guy called Joe by his family, his friends, and his business associates, from grip to producer. This pre-supposed that Joe is an easy-going fellow who puts on no airs, will talk readily to anyone, and has no patience with swank and inaccessibility.

This all happens to be true. But it's also true that Cotten has a peculiar reticence, a genuine shyness which makes him a difficult person to know inside. This may be due to the fact that he hates people who love to turn themselves inside out in public. He thus leans too far the other way.

The first time I met Joe Cotten, it was a beautiful Sunday afternoon and he was just finishing breakfast. He explained immediately that this wasn't a habit he'd acquired in New York around the theatre. He had—and he was very honest about it—a great fatigue. But he'd collected it in a worthy cause. His stepdaughter, Judith, had never been given a Hollywood party and Joe thought it was about time a shindig was thrown for her upon her completion of the school year. Joe discovered that it was tough to compete with a sixteen-year-old on her first party. Now, all he wanted to do was walk. So we walked around the Pacific Palisades where he lives.

Then we climbed to where he could show me the view. The view from his house, he regretted to admit, wasn't a particularly good one. He wasn't playing himself and his possessions down deliberately. It was that guy-called-Joe in his nature that did it.

As we began to talk—his fatigue no less pronounced—I watched his tanned, lean face and listened to his unusual, timbrous voice, the voice that evidently does things to his women fans. Tall and rangy, Joe might have been a football player. When I queried him about this, he told me he did play professional football once.

Joe goes into half a dozen torrid love scenes with Deanna Durbin in Universal's picture, "Hers to Hold."

Remember him as Uncle Charley in "Shadow of a Doubt"? That Cotten man certainly is a versatile actor.

It was back in Washington, D. C., when he was attending a dramatic school and went broke. But football, he soon discovered, cost him too many teeth . . . and the roles for toothless actors were limited.

That brought him to the subject of his bete noir—his greatest fear: being typed. Once, Chic Sale, a young and talented man, was typed and made to play old men's parts. The same thing has happened to many others. When Cotten was handed his roles in "Citizen Kane" and "Lydia," he performed them with such consummate art that sentimental old ladies started sending him foot-warmers and shawls. They were slightly bewildered when he appeared in "Journey Into Fear" and "Shadow of a Doubt." They weren't certain whether he was a young actor playing old men's parts or an old actor playing young men's parts. But "Hers To Hold" has tipped the balance and the "young man" category, and now Cotten can breathe more easily.

Cotten learned about playing aged characters in his early days in New York. When he was between engagements, he worked for a photographer who specialized in "Before and After" pictures. "Before," Cotten had to impersonate the aging invalid, or the man-who-lost-his-pep-and-vitality. "After," Cotten was young, handsome and virile. He was so good at these characterizations that the wolf, which had been loitering conspicuously on the Cotten doorstep, was frightened away, never to return. For while plays may open and shut, "Before and After" ads, be they for pills or toupees, go on forever.

By this time—we were still walking—Cotten had plucked himself a branch from a tree and was chewing on it absently. He suggested that we start back to the house. He had lost the vague look; yet he talked with that same hesitancy I had first detected in his manner. He wasn't at a loss for words, since Joe is conspicuously one of the "intellectuals" of Hollywood. He was simply trying to explain himself to a stranger, and that's never easy.

We got as far as the porch, and I remarked on the smart color scheme and the comfortable furniture. Joe said the scheme was devised by his wife. Later I discovered that Joe is quite a hand with the saw, plane, and paint brush himself. In fact, for a while he was constructing so many bookcases that his wife had to conveniently misplace tools. A neighbor's chickens are now roosting in some of Joe's cabinet work but, as Joe observed, an egg is more valuable than a book.

Over coca-cola (unadulterated), Joe told me something about his early life. Through his discourse, the name of Orson Welles occurred frequently. This was natural enough since Joe joined the famous Mercury Theater soon after its founding and co-starred with Welles in many plays. It was Orson who brought Joe to Hollywood to play in "Citizen Kane."

"I first met Welles," said Joe, gulping his drink thirstily, "when we both laughed at the wrong place in a radio program. We were in the audience and an actor—a pompous fool—made an embarrassing error in pronunciation. We were the only two in the radio audience who dared laugh. We were thrown out on our ears by the producer.

"I'll never forget our first play. It was presented for the Federal Theatre, and it was called 'Horse Eats Hat,' a slightly bewildering French farce. The critics hated it . . . but the audiences loved it. They loved it so much we actually had repeaters in the audience. We discovered this one night when we tried to change the lines. The audience shouted back the right ones. And because the audience had the cast outnumbered (contrary to our general policy, I might add), we had to stick to the right ones."

Joe smiled and all his facial lines went upward. He has high cheek bones and slightly slanted eyes. He even wears his sandy hair in a pompadour. He was beginning to enjoy talking about himself and was a vastly different person from the "movie guide" I first met.

He was born, he told me, in Petersburg, Virginia. His father was, and still is, superintendent of the mails there. He spent sixteen years in Petersburg, dutifully going to the public school and high school. But, he admitted, he was somewhat of a problem. He read a great deal, mostly plays, saw every road company that had the fortitude to come to Petersburg, and avidly devoured the theatrical and "drama" pages of the local newspaper. Since his father was so intimately connected with the mails, it wasn't hard for Joe to catch an occasional glimpse of a metropolitan paper which really had dramatic pages.

He began to pester his father about becoming an actor. This was a far cry from being a Virginia gentleman—the goal his father had set for him. So Joe, who has a stubbornness all his own, started on a campaign of being a general nuisance.

"In fact," he admits, "the boll weevil and I were the biggest problems the townspeople had to cope with."

The boll weevil was controlled with eradicator; Joe with banishment. The day he was graduated from high school, he was handed some money and told to go find himself a dramatic school in Washington, the nearest large city. Joe joyously took the train for Washington, vowing to come back to Petersburg another Garrick.

But the money . . . as money will . . . petered out. That's when he started playing professional football and losing teeth. It paid twenty-five dollars a quarter . . . and pay your own dentist bill. But it didn't pay Joe. He tried selling vacuum cleaners. Unfortunately, in those days, every house in Washington had a vacuum cleaner.

That drove him to New York, where he became a paint salesman. He learned, to (Continued on page 86)

Mister—you're getting paid in DYNAMITE!

LET'S NOT KID OURSELVES about this. Our pay envelope today is dynamite.

If we handle it wrong, it can blow up in our face . . . lengthen the war . . . and maybe wreck our chances of having happiness and security after the war.

The wrong way to handle it...and why

The wrong way is for us to be good-time Charlies. To wink at prices that look too steep . . . telling ourselves we can afford to splurge.

We can't afford to—whether we're business men, farmers, or workers. And here's why:

Splurging will boost prices. First on one thing, then all along the line.

Then, wages will have to go up to meet higher prices. And higher wages will push prices up some more . . . faster and faster, like a runaway snowball.

The reason this can happen is that there is more money in pay envelopes today than there are things to buy with it. This year, we Americans will have 45 billion dollars more income than there are goods and services to buy at present prices. 45 billion dollars extra money!

That's the dynamite!

The right way to handle it...and why

Our Government is doing a lot of things to keep the cost of living from snow-balling.

Rationing helps. Price ceilings help. Wage-and-rent stabilization helps. Higher taxes help. They're controls on those dangerous excess dollars.

But the real control is in our hands. Yours. Mine.

It won't be fun. It will mean sacrifice and penny-pinching. But it's the only way we can win this war . . . pay for it . . . and keep America a going nation afterwards.

And, after all, the sacrifice of tightening our belts and doing without is a small sacrifice compared with giving your life or your blood in battle!

Here's what You must do

Buy only what you absolutely need. And this means absolutely. If you're tempted, think what a front-line soldier finds he can get along without.

Don't ask higher prices—for your own labor, your own services, or goods you sell. Resist pressure to force YOUR prices up.

Buy rationed goods only by exchanging stamps. Shun the Black Market as you would the plague.

Don't pay a cent above ceiling prices.

Take a grin-and-bear-it attitude on taxes. They must get heavier. But remember, these taxes help pay for Victory.

Pay off your debts. Don't make new ones. Getting yourself in the clear helps keep your Country in the clear.

Start a savings account. Buy and keep up adequate life insurance. This puts your dollars where they'll do you good.

Buy more War Bonds. Not just a "per-cent" that lets you feel patriotic, but enough so it really pinches your pocketbook.

If we do these things, we and our Government won't have to fight a postwar battle against collapsing prices and paralyzed business. It's our pay envelope. It's up to us.

KEEP PRICES DOWN!

Use it up • Wear it out
Make it do • Or do without

THE LADY CAN'T DRAW

Barbara Stanwyck is a very talented actress, but she can't draw a straight line. The regular gang of the MacMurrays, the Millands, the Zeppo Marx's, and the Bill Wellmans all get together each Saturday night for dinner.

After dinner they play the "Game," but in their own way. Instead of acting out quotations, they draw them.

Whenever it is Barbara's turn to draw, everyone shudders. One night recently they gave her "A" for her effort. The word was "Luftwaffe" and the airplanes she drew looked like chickens. When her side lost as a result, Barbara was presented with a ripe tomato as her reward for the evening's labor.

Best artist in the group is Mal Milland with a close second by Ann Sothern.

A MAN WHO DATES THE STARS

Bonita Granville and Margaret Hayes are sharing a beau. He is dashing Greg Bautzer, ex-attorney in Hollywood and now in the Navy and stationed at Lakehurst, New Jersey.

Both girls passed through New York on personal appearances and bond tours and were squired by Greg. They each write to him every day and get letters in return and frequent phone calls and wires. May the best lady win.

Ladies in the past who did not win Greg were Lana Turner and Dorothy Lamour.

A WEDDING DRESS

Janet Blair's wedding came as a surprise to most of movieland, but to Edward Stevenson, RKO dress designer, it was a rush affair. In great secrecy he was called at midnight one night by Miss Blair's agent and asked whether he would design the dress for the wedding. This he did and supervised all the fittings. The lovely chartreuse crepe dress was the most becoming thing Janet has ever had, and she wears it now on her bond tours. She said she thinks during wartime that girls should wear their wedding clothes as best clothes rather than laying them in moth balls as so many do.

Mr. Stevenson received a lovely gold watch from Miss Blair and her husband with the inscription on the back. "To Eddie Dan Cupid in chartreuse."

SHE WRITES HER OWN PLAY?

Joan Bennett's book "How To Be Attractive." was purchased by Twentieth Century-Fox for a screen play. It may be her first picture when she returns to the screen. The book originally was just a series of tips for milady on beauty, but during the period Joan was waiting for her baby she whipped up a plot and presented it to the studio, and they are using it as a pattern for a picture. The story rather follows the pattern of the life of beauty expert Elizabeth Arden.

SHIRLEY'S GOT A BOYFRIEND!

Remember what a flirtatious child Shirley Temple was? Well, now that she's fifteen, she's still got that twinkle in her merry eyes. She flits from one beau to another. Right now the one is the boy next door, Don Gallery, adopted son of Zazu Pitts, who adopted Don when his mother Barbara LaMarr died. Shirley has more beaus than she knows what to do with, but seems to favor Don, for the moment.

A CUP OF COFFEE, A COCKTAIL, OR A HIGHBALL

And the coffee up top of the page belongs to Aurello Nawrocki, the very pretty girl who's out with Wolloce Beery, the man who's rarely seen out with a pretty girl.

The cocktail? Suson Hayward, now of Hollywood, spends time with the man she used to model for. He's Jon Whitcomb, now a Navy lieutenant. You know those Whitcamb girls he draws.

And as for the highball, that belongs to Johnny Poyne and his new date, Elyse Knox. Maybe a few eyebrows didn't go up when they walked into the Mocambo.

WILL THEY EVER FORGET?

Greer Carson was dining at the smart Savoy in Beverly Hills. She was wearing a stunning new short dinner frock with a low cut neckline, and Greer felt she looked very smart and pretty.

A lady at a nearby table got up and came toward her. Greer started to smile and prepared to sign an autograph in her nicest style. Imagine how she felt when the woman said, "I didn't think that Mrs. Miniver would wear a low cut dress like that."

AN OPINION ON TAYLOR

Coming across that handsome Robert Taylor on the set of "Russia" in its final day's shooting, he gave me the kind of yarn that makes you know why everybody who's ever really known him, is so fond of him.

It seems that Bob was bedeviled by his stepson, Skip, to get into his naval uniform. After many days, Bob gave in and came downstairs in all of his splendor. Barbara beamed at the gorgeous sight, young Skip scrutinized, bent, dipped and swayed around and finally broke the silence with "Ty Power looks handsomer in his!"

It seems Skip is a great Power fan.

MAKE THE BOYS WHISTLE

Fashion tip from Muriel King, designer of costumes for Columbia's "Cover Girls." Take three yards of veiling, the color of your dress, or direct contrast. Get some velvet bows, either on combs or not, get either some fresh flowers or some mighty pretty artificial ones. Pin the veil in the center front of your head, take ends and cross lightly in center back, so that veiling makes frame for face, bring ends around neck as scarf. Take your bows and flowers and place them in the most becoming places, catching the veiling with a hairpin where you want to shape the hat.

About four hairpins, three bows, two flowers and the veiling make you something for the boys to whistle at. Rita Hayworth, Anita Colby and many other "Cover Girls" have adopted the idea.

thumbed through the program, blinked, and told ourself we was robbed. Miss Stuart had been replaced by some young upstart named Olivia de Havilland.

But it was too late to leave. The orchestra was hard at it, and if you left now, the folks would say you were a roughneck, a man with no culture, a man who obviously was headed for the nearest bar. So we stayed. And presently we saw the girl who had taken Miss Stuart's place, and then we weren't sorry. Miss de Havilland was not a blonde, but she had everything Miss Stuart had and more. From that moment on, we were a de Havilland fan.

SITTING there in our brown study, we remembered the first time we talked to Miss de Havilland. She was a film actress now at Warner studios, and there were stars in her eyes. Imagine being chosen by Mr. Warner to play Hermia in the film version of "the Dream." A girl just out of a small town California high school getting a break like that. Mr. Reinhardt was wonderful. The Warners were wonderful. William Dieterle who was helping Reinhardt direct was wonderful. Life was wonderful. That was the way she talked then.

Life was still wonderful the next time we met, even though she was leading lady in a thing called "Alibi Ike," which wasn't much of a picture anyway you looked at it. You couldn't expect to get all the good parts on the lot, she pointed out. After all Kay Francis was there, and Bette Davis was there, and there were any number of pretty kids around with talent.

We became friends. We called her Olivia, and she called us by our first name. We had lunch together. We agreed that the Warner Bros. were wonderful, Michael Curtiz who was directing her in most of her pictures was wonderful, Carlisle Jones, the press agent, was wonderful. We talked about books and poetry and art and music—neither knowing much about any of the subjects. We walked into the Green Room and had her bark like a dog at us, which was her parlor trick and meant she was fond of us. We watched her go up and up and marvelled at the fact that she didn't change much. And when we left town three years ago, we were still marvelling. If she hadn't changed in four years, she was safe. Four years is a long time in Hollywood, where one picture can make a heel out of even the very nicest guy, you know.

Editor's luck. Greer Garson had returned for one day's work on "Madame Curie" when our Miss Waterbury happened along and got herself photographed with the exquisite Greer and fine director Mervyn Le Roy. Greer is showing photographs of her white French poodle, now in service. "What about your other poodle?" asked our editor. "Oh, he's strictly a desk dog," said witty Greer.

And just because Ruth Waterbury edits from Hollywood, she couldn't be in New York recently when Jerry Lester, well-known comedian, received a scroll saying Movieland selected him as "the outstanding new comedy star of 1943." Here you see the parchment being presented to him by Philip Keenan, general manager of Hillman Periodicals, publishers of Movieland. The award was made on Lester's Sunday night coast-to-coast radio show, broadcast by CBS.

THIS year we came back. We buttonholed the first person we met and asked about our little friend, Olivia. "Still the same nice kid?"

"She drinks," said our friend with a shake of the head.

"You mean . . ."

"Oh, just an occasional cocktail," said our friend. "But you remember—she never used to touch it."

We said that didn't surprise us. We drank an occasional cocktail ourselves, and nobody seemed upset.

"She goes out with men," said our friend.

"What do you want her to go out with?" we asked. "Monkeys?"

"But she never used to go out at all," said our friend. "She used to stay home and study."

We agreed that things had come to a pretty pass. We asked how she felt about Warners'.

"Well, she still thinks Carlisle Jones is wonderful," said our friend. He left us, looking very depressed.

SO WE began to make other inquiries. We found out a lot of things from a lot of different people. We found out Olivia was short with a newspaper woman who asked her about her love life. She was unhappy. She was too gay, in a world full of unhappiness. She had made too much money. She didn't make enough money. She had a broken heart. She didn't have a broken heart. Confused, we decided to see for ourselves.

It was with some trepidation we headed out on the RKO lot where she was starring in "Government Girl." We stopped awhile to watch a man skidding across the lawn on the seat of his pants. He was, we were told, getting grass stains on a pair of pants to be worn by Pat O'Brien. We wondered if it wouldn't be more sensible to look in on O'Brien. Then we remembered Mr. O'Brien was sore at us about something or other so we took a deep breath, put our head down, and went doggedly ahead.

Stage 12 was dark and cool. We tripped over a light cable. We collided with a wild wall. We put our head in a dressing room; and a blond we didn't recognize gave us a dirty look. Then off yonder we heard a dog barking. We followed the sound, and there we were behind the camera, looking at the girl who barks like a dog.

"Hello, Olivia," we said.

The lights were in her face, so she couldn't see us. "But I recognize the voice," she said. "When did you get back?"

She didn't walk right out of the scene and greet us. We understood why. Director Dudley Nichols was rehearsing a scene, and Mr. Nichols is not a man who likes to have his star walk out on him.

A big fellow at our elbow remarked that Miss de Havilland had the prettiest eyes in pictures.

Our guide introduced the big fellow.

"This is Sonny Tufts," our guide said.

"How do you get along with Olivia?" we asked.

"Fine."

"Difficult?"

"She plays gags," said Tufts. "All the time, she plays gags. This morning a mail man came on the set. He told me he had a truck load of fan mail outside. Wanted to know where to put it. I thought it was odd because the other picture I'm in, 'So Proudly We Hail,' isn't released, and who would be writing me fan mail? So I went out and there wasn't any truck. She had hired an extra to dress up like a mail man. Just because I said I didn't think Alan Ladd got twelve thousand fan letters a week."

Tufts sighed. "The other day was my birthday," he went on. "Mr. Koerner—he runs the studio—sent me a wallet. The man who brought it took it back to have my name put on it. Half an hour later another man comes around with another wallet. Says he's from Paramount and Mr. Freeman who runs Paramount is sending me a present. I open the package and it's another wallet. Just like the first one. There are two dollar bills in the wallet and a note signed by Mr. Freeman saying this is a bonus for my work in 'So Proudly We Hail.' I fell for it. The man took the wallet back and said he was going to get my name put on it. Then I looked up and saw Olivia laughing at me. Another gag."

We gathered from Tufts' manner he didn't think she was very difficult. And we gathered from remarks by the crew that they didn't think she was difficult, either. Nor was she quarreling with Mr. Nichols. He was telling her what to do, and she wasn't squawking. Presently the rehearsal ended, and she had time for us. She took our hand.

She said, "Don't for heaven's sake ask me whether I've changed."

"Because I have," she said a little later on. We sat in her dressing room with lame dog Shadrach and had a cup of tea.

"How have you changed?" we asked.

"Let me see," said Olivia thoughtfully. "Well, I sleep in pajamas instead of nightgowns, and I only use one pillow. I get out of bed on the right instead of the left side. I like beer. I like borscht. You remember, I didn't like it in the old days. And things that happen to me now aren't tragic—they're funny."

"Things?"

"I don't always get the parts I want. A few years ago that would have broken my heart."

"Why are you over here? Through at Warners'?"

"No," said Olivia. "I've six months to go. It's a funny story, why I'm here. Myron Selznick, my agent, called me up. 'Olivia,' said Myron, 'You are going to earn a lot of money for ten weeks' work.'

"I told him that was fine," said Olivia. "I told him that was wonderful. But I pointed out I was working for Warners' and that I got so much a week, so how was I to make a fortune?

"'You forget about my brother, David, has a commitment on you. You forget he traded Ingrid Bergman

GIRL CRAZY (MGM) is a fast and furious load of entertainment with Mickey Rooney and Judy Garland knocking themselves out for your amusement. The music is George Gershwin's best with Tommy Dorsey's orchestra to play it, and Mickey and Judy to sing and dance. In the present version of the show, it is a school instead of a dude ranch to which Mickey's irate father ships him after nightclub escapades have proved embarrassing to the family. The school is strictly for boys, but Mickey finds a way to switch it to a co-educational institution.

Gil Stratton, June Allyson, and Nancy Walker, all from the stage cast of "Best Foot Forward," join briefly in the youthful fun. Yet the affair so exclusively belongs to Mickey and Judy that anyone else has small chance.

TRUE TO LIFE (Paramount) isn't about anything important. But it is a lot of fun. Two radio writers run shy on plot material for a soap opera. In searching for a fresh idea, one of the lads encounters a slightly wacky family who make perfect copy for the Sudsy Soap serial. He puts them on the air and is kept in hot water trying to prevent them from hearing the broadcasts. When they do recognize themselves as radio characters, there is a million dollar suit filed for invasion of personal privacy.

Dick Powell and Franchot Tone enjoyably play the radio writers, and Mary Martin is charming as the girl of the family. Yet scene after scene is stolen by the veteran Victor Moore, who gives you many laughs with the crazy things he keeps inventing. A couple of gay songs help to enliven the picture which is built on the premise that movies need not be true to life but that life should be more true to the movies.

THE FALLEN SPARROW (RKO) finds John Garfield in the best role that has fallen his lot in many a day. He plays a war-shattered veteran who fought in Spain. He holds a secret that the "little man in Berlin" wanted to wring from him by two years of torture and later sent agents to kill his best friend in America. To avenge that friend, Garfield again enters the fray against the "little man." There is a matter of honor involved.

The picture should probably be classed as a mystery-melodrama although such a classification fails to do justice to the flavor of the story. Let's call it instead a superior exercise in suspense. Three lovely leading ladies appear with Garfield, Maureen O'Hara, Patricia Morison, and Martha O'Driscoll, and a magnificent menace by Walter Slezak.

BEHIND THE RISING SUN (RKO-Radio) will gain attention as the first factual film based upon the events that led the Japanese government to acts of world conquest which resulted in war. It was written by James Young who served as an American newspaper man in Tokyo for thirteen years before he was imprisoned as an enemy of the militaristic-minded powers of the new order. There is a strong parallel drawn between the rise of brutality in Nippon and that enforced by Hitler in Germany. The same men who put "Hitler's Children" on the screen repeated with "Behind the Rising Sun." If you could take the first, you should see the second.

Margo, Tom Neal, and J. Carroll Naish play Jap characters. Robert Ryan and Don Douglas are excellent as Americans. Yet the prize role is the Russian performed by George Givot.

HI DIDDLE DIDDLE (United Artists) offers boisterous nonsense which is as close to boudoir farce as the Hays office will allow. What plot there is revolves around the sale of stock and the recovery of money lost in gambling so that a sailor and his bride can get away on their honeymoon. Some of the laughs arise from downright slapstick situations, with a dash of animated cartoons rung in to help.

Pola Negri looks like a million in her return to the screen. Adolphe Menjou, Martha Scott, Dennis O'Keefe, Billie Burke, and June Havoc make their presence felt.

I DOOD IT (MGM) is a title that should not deter you from seeing this comedy even if you are among the minority who do not care for the Red Skelton radio program. You have never seen the comedian Skelton proves to be in a role that fits him like a proverbial glove. He is a pants presser in a swank valet service which gives him opportunity to borrow a wardrobe that makes him the best dressed man in Manhattan. Hopelessly in love with a stage star, he marries her through a fluke. There follow two of the funniest pantomime sequences of the season, one in which he can't pick up his wife after she passes out and the other when he gets mixed up trying to put on a crepe beard to join her show. Both these scenes are screams.

Eleanor Powell plays the stage star to score most pleasingly. Her taps are tops as usual, and for good entertainment measure, there is a specialty featuring Lena Horne and Hazel Scott. Jimmy Dorsey and his orchestra slickly provide the music.

to Warners' for you. So you are going to earn a great deal of money at RKO. You are going to earn one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.' You can imagine how I felt. 'Myron, that is terrific,' I told him. 'Wait a minute,' said Myron. 'You are going to earn a hundred and twenty-five thousand, but you aren't going to get it. David is going to get it. You just get your regular salary, minus my commission.' "

"So?" we asked.

"I get my regular salary minus Myron's commission," said Olivia.

Nichols called her then, and she went back into the shot. She said to us, "Let's meet later." So we did.

IT WAS hours later, as we sat in Luceys with Olivia, Nichols, and Sonny Tufts and had something stronger than tea, that it occurred to us that people were peculiar. The run-of-the-mill people, we mean. They expect bank tellers to change as they grow older. They expect floor walkers, undertakers, grave diggers, garbage collectors, and bar tenders to change. But they are amazed when an Olivia de Havilland turns out to be something entirely different from what she was a few years back. So they shake their heads and ask what has happened to her.

Watching her, listening to her talk, hearing her laugh a little more loudly than she used to, we realized that she had changed, that she was not at all the same girl we met back yonder.

Her brown eyes are as lovely as ever, but they look at the world differently. A little disillusioned perhaps. Anyway, wise. She hadn't been in love when she came to Hollywood. At least not seriously. She's in love seriously now with Captain John Houston, though she doesn't talk about it and parries any questions. But mention his name, and her eyes light up. We've seen them together when he was on leave recently. We listened to her tell us about seeing the picture he made for the Army in Alaska and realized that there was pride in her voice. We didn't ask her whether she was going to marry him because we figured when she wanted to announce that, she would.

Maybe she's been in love several times in the past nine years. Most beautiful girls in their early twenties do fall for guys now and then—guys like James Stewart who was her escort for quite a while. We heard her say once that she was a one man girl, that if she married, that would be it. A serious girl, Olivia. In that respect, she hasn't changed, for she was serious when she came to Hollywood. However, she admits that there was a time in the last few years when she tried not to be serious, when she tried to be very gay and very frivolous.

It seems to us that the best way to approach the subject of the new de

It's Gregory Peck, girls—and everybody is plenty excited about him. He's the one who will play the role announced for Spencer Tracy in "The Keys of the Kingdom." With him is someone you ought to know—Toumanova, the ballerina. She and Mr. Peck will both be in "Revenge" at RKO.

Havilland is to analyze her as you would any young woman. For that's what she is—a young woman who through a whim of fate or Max Reinhardt or Warner Bros., or the fans became a star. Take a girl named Sophie McGonigle, aged eighteen, fresh from the country with hayseed in her hair. (We are speaking of Miss McGonigle, not Miss de Havilland for to our knowledge Olivia never saw a hay mow.) Well, Sophie comes to Hollywood to get in pictures. Instead she gets a job scrubbing the floors at the Mocambo. One Thursday night a producer who has been sleeping under one of the tables wakes up and sees her there all by herself pushing the mop around. What grace. What poise. What charm. So he gives her a contract, and her first picture is terrific. So are her second and her third and her fourth. A change comes over Sophie. (Please remember this is Sophie we are discussing, that we are at Luceys and by now Miss de Havilland, Sonny Tufts, and Nichols have left us staring into our glass and musing about change.) What were we talking about? Oh yes, Sophie. Well, the boys give Sophie a rush. At first she is shy. Then she reads her press notices. She sees her name linked with this guy and with that—guys she had never met. So she decides she might as well go out. She has fun. She starts kicking up her heels. She learns to wear smart clothes. She becomes what she thinks a star should become—a hard-to-get-along-with girl. Then gradually the glitter wears off and she settles down to the quiet business of working and living. That is, if she has sense that's what she does.

But it takes people quite a while to realize that Sophie has settled down, that she has passed through the sophisticated phase, that she is, at bottom, a sensible young woman with a career.

At the moment, that's the way it is with people and with Olivia. They're looking at her, not as she is now, but as she was last year or year before last when she was going through the getting-one's-balance phase. Sure she has changed, but we're not surprised. As a matter of fact, we're glad of it. Who wants anyone to stay eighteen years old? Besides, she'll be fascinating when she's thirty.

THE END

SAY . . .

During dress rehearsal of Orson Welles' Mercury Wonder Show For Servicemen, an onlooker—entranced at the sight of Welles locking Rita Hayworth in a trunk and making her "vanish"—exclaimed at the Boy Wonder's dexterity in the hocus-pocus art. Joseph Cotten, who was standing nearby, overheard him. "Oh, if you think that's good," he told the chap, "you ought to see Orson make money disappear."

and bruised wrists, and giggled. "Aren't you being a bit hard on the fellow? He has tried it the other way, you know!"

He takes his picture assignments as they come, usually accepts the dialogue as it is written for him. Most actors and actresses indignantly refuse a role now and then, wax temperamental over a part or the lines in it. Subconsciously it bolsters their ego. The ego of Sanders is such that he is confident he cannot give a bad performance, and that any line, spoken by him, gains distinction. So far, he's proved his point . . . to such an extent that minor pictures are now definitely relegated to his past.

Privately, however, he has his own Academy Award ready and waiting for a screen play which does not contain the lines: "You must get some sleep, now." It's the only phrase he ever asks to have deleted.

"It seems to be a mechanical impossibility to write anything longer than two reels without someone sending someone off to bed. Even the best picture I ever saw, 'Mrs. Miniver,' had Garson trundling Pidgeon off to sleep, after his return from Dunkirk."

No flash in the developing-pans was Sanders, his ascent to stardom was a matter of some seven years and more than thirty pictures. Starting his Hollywood career with a poisonously villainous role in "Lloyds of London," he grew on the public—especially the woman public—like a slow case of undulant fever, symptomized by both chills and flushes.

His American debut was preceded by several pictures made for British studios, and before that, by stage successes. His very first professional engagement was as the lead in a musical comedy, a fact which he deflates with a few neatly pointed sentences.

"The producer heard me singing at a party and thought I had possibilities—I've forgotten whether he was very drunk or I was. Under more sober circumstances he didn't like my approach to the role and I didn't like his. I was fired."

Young George decided to stay in the theatrical business to prove the producer wrong. He understudied several leading men, each time stepping into their roles before the musical had finished its run. This, too, he dismissed in off-hand fashion.

"If I had any outstanding talent, it was my ability to pick the right leading men. Stupid fellows, they either went out on benders or developed indigestion or something."

At any rate, he eventually attained a leading man's status all his own and drew the attention of the film studios. He signed a contract with a major British producer, and that very night the studio burned to the ground.

"No, I didn't set it on fire . . . but sometimes I look back through the years and wonder whether I shouldn't have."

"Nothing exciting—absolutely nothing" . . . has happened to him during his entire screen career. This is no understatement on his part. The excitement has been mostly on the part of feminine fans, who, following him through a succession of roles small and large, began to wonder whether, in a real-life clinch, they would want most to fight it out with soft words or a sharp scissors.

Any actor who possesses this particularly disturbing quality is a star as far as his women public is concerned, regardless of how long it takes his producer to officially award him that status. In the case of Sanders, like that of Humphrey Bogart, it took his movie bosses a while to catch on. In the more recent case of Alan Ladd, realization came quick.

The Englishman's peculiar handsomeness is not of the orthodox sort. His somewhat glacial charm can be attributed to the fact that he is definitely and elegantly male. There is something about this flagrantly masculine superiority, the six-foot-three of height and a nose that is constantly looked down, that infuriates women (but in a pleasant way!) on and off screen. They simply cannot help being feminine around him, doing all sorts of fluttery, futile things. Mr. Sanders becomes more and more superior over this lack of poise. Thus, the legend has gradually grown that he is a "woman hater."

Men have nearly as hard a time getting along with him. They, too, have the uncomfortable feeling that he has applied the cold measure of his intelligence to their foibles, and discarded them as unworthy of his time and effort.

Take the manly pastime of yachting. Most male stars at one time or other allow themselves the indulgence of owning and operating a boat. It gives them a feeling of virility and a subject for a "baritone" conversation. In addition, it is a picturesque background for still photographs, standing in dungarees at the mast, their profiles and chest muscles bucking a strong wind.

Mr. Sanders at one time owned a boat and spent some of his time leading a vagabond existence aboard. Eventually he sold it. His explanation is simple: "After you have sailed to Catalina and back, and back to Catalina and back again—that about does it!"

His boat, when he had it, could scarcely be termed a yacht. He was discouraged from buying anything more expensive after reading a few yachting magazines.

"Every boatsman buys them—'Yachting,' 'Rudder' and that sort of thing. You sit at home taking mental voyages, you know. You open the February issue, and there is a large picture of the palatial yacht just built by Mr. and Mrs. So-and-so. Mr. and Mrs. So-and-so are frightfully rich and have been subscribing to the magazine for years, so in the March issue there are more pictures of the yacht, complete with an article detailing so many expensive appointments you wonder whether they are trailing part of them behind in a dinghy.

"In April they christen the yacht, the Super Sea-Gull, and there are pictures of Mr. and Mrs. So-and-so, all over-dressed up, smashing the champagne on the prow. The trials are held in May, with the Super Sea-Gull out-distancing everything afloat, and everybody frightfully happy about the whole thing. In June you turn to the want ad section, and there at the top of the 'For Sale' column is the Super Sea-Gull!"

Son of a wealthy British rope manufacturer, Sanders has a background of extensive travel and educational sorties into the best schools. His mother, Margaret Kolbe Sanders, distinguished herself as a horticulturist, collecting national prizes for her flowers and bee-hives. There is a bit of fiction to the effect that she gave up this last activity when the infant George wandered into the apiary one day and stung all the other little bees to death.

Pure fact says that George was born in St. Petersburg, Russia, under the protection of the British embassy there, and received his early training in Russian schools. Came the war and the Revolution, and George still remembers the escape of his family across ice-covered rivers. Safely back in England, his parents settled down to raising their sons as Englishmen. George attended Dunhurst and Bedales schools and went through Brighton College.

Having been born into a bi-lingual home, he found that languages came naturally to him. In addition to Russian and Spanish, he has a working knowledge of French and German . . . and if it so moves him, can refuse to answer you in any of the four languages.

During his school days, the young George was an outstanding athlete. He became interscholastic champion in boxing, and topped a swimming career by saving a man from drowning in the Thames. Among his souvenirs is a testimonial from the British Humane Society, generously inscribed on vellum. He values the plaque highly, having found it an excellent practice target for dart throwing.

In his callow youth, he fancied becoming a scientist. He became interested in the technological aspects of industry almost as soon as he could spell it, and by the time he was graduated from college had patented three water devices for swimming toys. Engaging for a while in technical textile research, he left it to experiment with a tobacco venture in the Argentines.

Somewhere in between these various interests, he found time to learn to play the piano, guitar, and saxophone—also, to cultivate the rich baritone which he has never used on the screen, "because stage musicals are fun . . . but screen musicals are just silly."

He considers acting a business, which he may at any time decide to abandon for some other business. Asked whether he ever "lived" his part in preparation of a screen-role, after the manner of Muni and Laughton, he was surprised into a loud snort, "Good heavens, no!" It was undoubtedly the most emotion he had ever shown in any conversation.

He likes the home he built in Hollywood, because, "why shouldn't I—I built it the way I'd like it!" One of his excursions into print, favorable and otherwise, was made when he told a columnist he had purchased his homesite because it was not in a fashionable neighborhood. Other residents of the same neighborhood took exception, much to his amazement. "They accused me of being uncomplimentary. Since I don't like fashionable neighborhoods, I considered I was paying this one a compliment!"

As for friends, the Sanders social circle consists of six—or maybe eight—he has never really counted. He regards the number, whatever it is, as entirely adequate.

"I suppose one should really go around making new friends . . . but I don't see why. There's nothing wrong with the ones I already have . . . and anyhow, I have only eight chairs in my dining room."

Off screen he prefers non-professional associates. An actor, in his opinion, soon grows to look too much like an actor.

"It's very easily explained. I have an acquaintance who is a sheep-farmer, from a long line of sheep-farmers. Look at him, and he looks like a sheep. It is the same with actors—there is a certain occupational distortion of features which becomes quite recognizable."

Sanders is thirty-seven years old and during the filming of "Appointment in Berlin," he received his army induction papers . . . which may, or may not be one of those omens Hitler is always dreading. Deferment was granted until the end of his picture commitments.

The Britisher himself had little to say on the subject until asked for his opinion of the current agitation for a government ruling on the "essential" status of all actors.

"I do not think the matter is up to the government . . . nor do I think it is up to Hollywood. There is only one way we can be 'essential' and that is, if the public decides that it is important to them that we remain on the screen. Therefore, I don't think anything should be done, unless the public wants to do it . . . and they probably won't."

In more typical fashion he explains his preference as to army service. "I should like to be a liaison officer between the Americans and the British, explaining the idiosyncrasies of the Americans to the British, the idiosyncrasies of the British to the Americans . . . and the idiosyncrasies of myself to both!"

THE END

In commenting on a Hollywood actor who suddenly turned from a recluse into a playboy, Director Robert Diodmak said, "He's just made the discovery that practically half the people in this world are women."

THE THREE WOMEN IN DANA ANDREWS' LIFE

time and again, the old restless impulses stirred in him, and he felt like running away from everything.

So in 1930, he hitch-hiked to California. He went to all the studios, and nothing happened. He had his ambition to be an actor; but there were hundreds of thousands of youngsters with the same ambition. He had a pleasant voice; but it was an untrained one, and thousands of youngsters have pleasant voices.

Dana took a job driving a school bus at ten dollars a week in Van Nuys, just outside Hollywood. He managed to live on that, too. There was an old lady in Van Nuys who gladly gave him room and board for five dollars. He began attending night school and acting in a show put on by the dramatic group. But hundreds of thousands of youngsters appear in school plays, and still never get anywhere.

It might have happened that way with Dana, if he hadn't met the first of the three women who were to influence his life. Her name was Janet Murray, and she was the daughter of a prominent Van Nuys family. Janet was a roving reporter for a Hollywood newspaper; she had studied for a teacher's certificate. She acted in the plays put on by the dramatic group of the Van Nuys night school. Dana and she met at the rehearsals of "The Thirteenth Chair" and discovered a common interest in poetry and psychology. By the time Dana realized that he was in love, he progressed to one hundred dollars a month at the gasoline filling station. Certainly one hundred dollars a month hardly seemed enough to support a girl accustomed to the sort of life Janet had led.

"Let's wait," said Dana, hoping that eventually he'd be able to do better.

Janet felt that their happiness depended very little upon money. They compromised by waiting six months, and by that time Dana was making a hundred and twenty-five a month at the filling station.

Janet believed in Dana's ability as an actor and singer, and encouraged him to spend out of their meagre budget, twenty dollars a month for singing lessons. She told him that he would be able to get into pictures when he had something to offer; and she was determined that he would have something.

It was an ideally happy marriage, and when they had a son, David, Dana felt life couldn't be more beautiful. Then late in 1935 Janet got pneumonia. Three days later she died.

All Dana's dreams and hopes vanished. He couldn't work or sleep. He couldn't face the empty future. He didn't have enough money to hire a housekeeper and a nurse to take care of the boy. He was not sure that he would ever go on home.

It was Janet's mother, Mrs. Agnes Murray, who saved him. Yes, his mother-in-law!

"You must go on with your singing and dramatic lessons," she told him. "If you care to live in my house, I've got plenty of room for you and David, and I'll take care of him. In that way, you'll be able to go on with everything you've planned."

She more than kept her promise. For three years, she was a mother to Dana. She watched over his son. She guarded Dana.

"If it hadn't been for her," he says soberly, "I might have given up everything."

It was Mrs. Murray who saw to it that Dana had a room of his own in which to work. When he needed anything, whether it was some physical or spiritual comfort, she saw that he had it. When he acted in a play or sang at a concert, she was always in the front row, applauding and encouraging him.

A friend of hers in Hollywood was giving a speech course, which cost one hundred dollars. Since Dana was making only one hundred and twenty-five dollars a month, he obviously couldn't afford that course. But Mrs. Murray heard about it, gave him the price of it. She said, "It's not a loan. It's a gift."

As the months passed, Dana no longer felt as if there were nothing left to live for. He was taking dramatic lessons at the Pasadena Playhouse. So it seemed as if there was some possibility that his dreams of a movie career might be eventually fulfilled.

"One of these days," said his mother-in-law, "you'll meet a girl you'll really care for. When you do, I would like to meet her before you get married and give you my opinion."

Dana smiled, and promised he'd introduce her when he met such a girl. He didn't know that he had already met her when he appeared in a Pasadena Playhouse play called "Money." But his thoughts weren't on marriage then or on pretty, blonde Mary Todd.

It was several years and perhaps a dozen plays later when he really discovered Mary. She was playing the romantic lead opposite him in "First Lady." When rehearsals were finished, he'd look around for someone to invite to share a soft drink or a malt with him, and Mary was close at hand. Over their soft drinks, they'd talk of their dreams and ambitions. When he'd ask her what she thought of his acting in this scene or that, she told him truthfully but very tactfully. "Of course, your way of doing the scene in the third act is probably best; but I wondered how it would seem with just a little more comedy in it."

Dana would put a little more comedy into his acting, and it would be just wonderful.

Gradually Dana realized that he was always looking for Mary. When she wasn't around, he'd feel a queer pang of disappointment.

He remembered his promise to the mother of his first wife. So he invited Mary to his home one day. David, just a toddler of four, with dark curly hair and brown eyes, was there. And just as his father had done, he fell in love with Mary. In a very short time he was sitting on her lap, while she was gaily reciting nursery rhymes to him. It was lucky she knew so many of them, because no matter how many she recited, he just kept asking for more.

After Dana had taken her home that first evening, Mrs. Murray said, "She's the one, isn't she?" He'd never brought any other girl home. Mrs. Murray said, "You couldn't have chosen anyone nicer."

Dana and Mary talked about marriage after that. He can't remember ever having made a definite proposal. Instead he began saying, "After we're married, Mary . . ."

By this time Dana was under contract to Samuel Goldwyn. He hadn't yet made a picture, but the dream of being in pictures was no longer intangible.

He knew that Mary had dreamed of a career, too. It wasn't easy for him to say it, but he felt that it had to be said. "Mary, dear, I'm a funny guy, you know. After we're married, if you're in pictures, too, I have a feeling it wouldn't work out. I want a home so much."

Mary understood. She had thought she would let nothing stand in the way of the career she wanted. But that was before she fell in love. Now it no longer mattered about her career. She was perfectly willing to give it up.

By this time Mary and Dana had decided upon their wedding, Dana had been cast in "The Westerner" and Goldwyn ordered him to grow a beard for the part. Since a church wedding would be too formal for a bearded bridegroom, Dana and Mary compromised on a quiet wedding at her home.

Just a sittin' and a knittin'—that's Paulette Goddard. And you won't see this shot in her new Paramount picture, "Standing Room Only"

David was at the wedding, too. Without any prompting from anyone, he filled a bag with orange blossoms and strewed them all over the floor.

When the ceremony was over, little David went up to the minister and said very solemnly, "Reverend Cornett, I want to thank you for what you did for Daddy and Mary."

Thus the third woman entered his life to love him and to be devotedly loved in return.

Now, when he has a script to study, he and Mary go over it together, she playing the woman's role. Then they make sound recordings, which Mary criticizes with her usual tact and good judgment.

Dana makes no important decision without consulting Mary first. He'll admit that his own judgment is sometimes faulty. There was, for instance, the time when a salesman showed him a beautiful Cadillac, and he began to think of all the reasons why he must buy it. When he told Mary, she said, "Well, of course, we can buy it if you think it's wise; but you know our old car runs all right, and it seems a mistake to invest so much money in a big car when the models will be changed drastically after the war. Don't you think it might be better to wait until then before we get a new car? And in the meanwhile we could put that money in War Bonds."

So they did, and Dana of course is glad.

With Mary's help, the question of bringing up David had been handled tenderly. When they were first married, Dana felt that it would be wise for Mary and himself to be by themselves, and for about eight months they lived in Beverly Hills, while David's grandmother continued to take care of the child. Dana also knew that it would be unfair to take the boy away from his grandmother completely and suddenly. So after that, Dana and Mary moved into a house close to Mrs. Murray's, and David ran back and forth between the two houses, so that both women helped bring him up. Later, Dana, feeling that the time had come for Mary to bring the child up, moved into a home farther away from Mrs. Murray's. Mrs. Murray now has her hands full acting as house mother at a girls' camp, but still comes to visit David and Dana and Mary every couple of months.

David likes moving pictures, but is not particularly impressed by his father's status as an actor. He much prefers Laurel and Hardy, the Blondie series, and the Great Gildersleeve to anything his father has done. Once when he was on the set with his father, someone asked him whether he intended to become an actor like his dad. "I should say not!" he said emphatically.

David is also very much interested in his baby sister, Katherine, who is eleven months old and just learning to walk.

Judging by how fast she's learning, it seems very likely that in time to come, Katherine will be the next woman in Dana's life to influence him. Already she winds him around her little finger.

Snails cooked by an expert . . . certain shades of red . . . thoughts of my childhood . . . wading in brooks . . . the name Mary . . . "Night and Day" . . . a hazardous ski-jump . . . that hitch-hiking scene from "It Happened One Night" . . . buttonhooks and Mary Jane shoes.

To cook—if I don't have to. Once I was cook for a whole summer; the family put on weight, but I was completely fed up with the steady job.

Snowy hills and everything that relates to skiing. People who ski are like people who fly, they have a world of their own; if you don't ski (fly) you don't rate when two enthusiasts get together. Let two ski-friends meet and they forget time, place, appointments they've sworn to keep, weather, meals and their favorite radio programs. They are deep in a discussion of professionals, how much snow at the summit, ski huts, lifts, timber, whether a storm is due.

I CAN'T BEAR:

Mystery stories . . . horror pictures . . . crossword puzzles . . . those upturned glasses women are wearing . . . all-white rooms . . . having people hurry me.

I MARVEL AT:

The San Francisco Bridge . . . the assurance of Clare Boothe Luce . . . the faithfulness of fans.

I'M IMPRESSED WITH:

The simplicity and nobility of Madame Chiang Kai-shek and Sister Kenny.

The boys at the VACS Canteen where I serve. Those boys are great in that they realize what they must face, yet they are eager to get on with the job.

I'M ANNOYED WITH:

Little Audrey stories . . . people who say, "What's buzzin', cousin?" or "Now you're cookin' with helium!"

I'M MAD ABOUT:

Quizzes—any kind. I listen to those on the radio. I get all the quiz books. I buy one magazine because of the quizzes in it. At home we keep score to see who has the highest I.Q. My evening is made when I can outscore my husband. It doesn't happen often, I confess, but look at all the education that man had! You know how the books say: "If you have a score of such-and-such, you are of genius rating;" when my score reaches that point, I float on a cloud for days.

I LIKE TO READ:

The latest novels . . . my husband's letters . . . and the encyclopedia. Once let me open a volume of the latter and I'm lost for hours.

I WISH I COULD:

Write shorthand . . . understand Morse and International Codes Perhaps it's a holdover from childhood when I used to imagine myself saving the ship or the company or whatever by being the only one present who could take down code, thus outwitting the villain or the enemy and coming out on top.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Enjoying breakfast in bed . . . wanting every dog I see . . . peeping into carriages at all babies.

Never being on time, except to work. My mother is always fifteen minutes ahead of any engagement. My brother arrives at a station with at least five minutes to spare. But that tornado streaking by just as they cry, "All abooo-ard!" that's Claudette!

Not writing letters. I telegraph or telephone instead—that is, I used to. I tried to send Joan Bennett a birthday wire and discovered that Uncle Sam won't let me.

Not remembering names, I nearly die trying to connect names to faces, worrying because the owners will think me snooty, when at that moment I'd offer an eyetooth for the ability to call, "Hello, Mr. Whoosis!"

I JUDGE PEOPLE BY:

Their hands. Men's hands give them away quicker than women's do, but I have a weakness for those utterly beautiful and useless women's hands you see once in a dozen years. They're always dropping things, they wouldn't know what to do with a screwdriver, but aren't they exquisite?

I NEVER JUDGE PEOPLE BY:

Their voices. Any voice can be altered, improved, deepened, cultivated, made to express an emotion entirely foreign to its owner's convictions; voices bear false witness with no effort.

ONCE IN MY LIFE I'D LOVE TO:

Christen a ship.

Be a guest on INFORMATION, PLEASE and get a higher score than the experts.

Go on a ski trip with time to follow the snow from one perfect spot to another, with no studio calling me back before I'm ready to come, nobody issuing warning: "Don't get freckled! Don't get hurt! Watch your skin! Careful of your ankles!"

ANSWER TO PUZZLE ON PAGE 6

I'VE BEEN THRILLED WITH:

Stunting in the Grand Canyon in an old crate with an open cockpit.

Athens, especially the Acropolis by moonlight—maybe this sounds corny, but it's a fact.

The first preview of "It Happened One Night." We knew the picture was full of laughs, but until that first audience fell shrieking into the aisles we hadn't guessed how many! It was incredible, it was heart-warming, it was something out of this world!

The invitations from the Women's Ski Team for me to represent California in an important contest. They weren't looking for a movie star, they wanted to win and they thought I had a chance. I wish I'd been able to try.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

I LIKE:

Receiving presents. What they are doesn't matter. My husband can bring me a new toothbrush and find me as blissfully excited over it as if he had handed me five extra coffee coupons.

Giving presents. But I'm too conscientious about choosing them; by Christmas Eve I'm a wreck because I worry so trying to find gifts I'd like myself that should absolutely thrill the recipient—usually something nobody has in stock. I exhaust myself, which isn't bright. But I never learn.

Radio shows with audiences . . . fans . . . to be called by name when fans recognize me. Once I caught a train I'd surely have missed because the man at the gates recognized me, shouted, "Claudette!" and re-opened the barrier after it had been shut.

I like my home. Correction, I love my home and everything it stands for.

I AM PROUD:

Of my husband and his service to our country.

Of my mother, her graciousness, beauty, and vivacity. I've always been proud of her looks; I'm much more particular about how she looks than how I look when we go out together.

I BELIEVE:

That while our boys are in the services, the least we can do is to learn and remember their insignia. (I try to do this, but sometimes I slip. The other night at the Canteen I greeted a man effusively, "So you're in the Coast Guard!" He raised a threatening arm. "Get outta here, lady—get outta here!" And then I realized that he wasn't in the Coast Guard, he was a gunner in the Navy).

In sending them off with a smile. But if it's your very own soldier, sailor, marine, or airman, he may like to see the tear behind that smile.

I KNOW:

That I, like women everywhere, long for the day when the lights go on again all over the world, when boys come home again—those who can come home—but I know, too, that that can't happen until the world is free.

I HOPE:

I can be proud of myself then for having done my part until that day shall come.

DEBUNKING THE LUPINO LEGEND

hundred per cent wicked women, because she doesn't believe in one hundred per cent wicked people. "If you go back in her life, you'll always find why she became that way. People are not born monsters. You can't play a person who is nothing but hate from the title to the last fade out."

She denies the rumor that "Lupino loves to cry." "Bunk! I hate it. If you see me cry for three minutes in a picture, it meant crying for eight hours on the set. Just try that once."

At the present time Lupino has what her friends refer to as the "writing era." She always wanted to do good writing. She talks to you about a couple of ideas (interesting, too) and vaguely dreams of a book of short stories she's going to do, "stories of real people, simple, down to earth, stripped to the essentials." As you see, Lupino strives for the highest goal of true, human simplicity. She admires Sherwood Anderson. "It must be wonderful to write as he did," she says, sighing. "Sometime in the near future, I'm going to take a year off from acting and intend to become a writing apprentice."

"A what?" we asked, slightly startled.

Lupino beamed with pleasure. "I'm going to sit in on story conferences. I want to learn how characters are being shaped, what makes people click, how fates are being plotted."

She brushed aside our objection that characters are shaped by life, not in story conferences; that people, not writers, do the plotting. "Sure," she said, "but you've got to learn the technique. You can't compose without knowing the keys. I'm trying to learn the keys."

She is very definite and outspoken about everything. She has her postwar plans all drawn up. When Louis comes back—Captain Louis Hayward of the U. S. Marines, now somewhere in the Southwest Pacific—she hopes they'll have a child. "It's the most important thing for a woman. My child and my husband . . . it will be wonderful. And a couple of good chums, books and music, and lots of fun, and one picture a year, leaving me all the time for the things I want to do."

Now, is this the language of madness? Isn't that the soundest blueprint of life you could think of?

The things she wants to do are many. Ida is all-round talent, plays the piano (well), sings (very well, as you will hear in "Thank Your Lucky Stars") composes songs (some of them have been played with success in the camp shows of the Canadian Royal Air Force). And her symphonic suite, "Alladin," was played eight years ago by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra.

"It was the greatest moment of my life," Ida says. No doubt she's sincere about that.

"I'm now at work on a musical comedy. I feel I'm guided by my late father in this work."

And this is another part of the Lupino Legend—one that has made people utter, "She's nuts. Now she claims spiritual communication with the other world."

The fact is that Ida Lupino was deeply devoted to her father, the late, great actor Stanley Lupino, who was caught by a German bomb when he did air raid warden duty at the height of the London blitz. The shock of his death made her break down, made her ill for months. Now, in doing things which she feels he would have liked her to do, she feels a sort of inner guidance—not a spiritual phenomenon but a deep memory. You don't have to be mad to feel that way.

"I've been trying to finish the score," she says. "Unfortunately, the day has only twenty-four hours. And when I come home from the studio, I have to learn my lines for the next day."

At this moment, Paul Henried, her partner in her current vehicle, "In Our Time," appeared on the scene. "Why didn't you study last night?" he demanded. "You missed your lines three times this morning."

As though this were her cue, Ida pretended to be temperamental and accused Mr. Henried of a score of the most abominable lines, while he was bursting with laughter. Whereupon Lupino got over her rage and then they were both laughing. Most moviegoers don't know it . . . but Lupino has a very happy, gay, contagious laugh.

"Paul, you're horrible," she said. To us she said, "Paul is my favorite partner."

When something goes wrong at the studio, Ida goes over to the Henrieds and has dinner with them. "She works up a terrific appetite by uttering insults against her enemies," Mr. Henried says. "Then Mrs. Henried, in true womanly spirit, supports Ida's views and gets quite mad herself. Afterwards you can find their nail polish and fingernails bitten off all over the place. Those women are wonderful."

Troupers par excellence, Lupino and Henried can put on an improvised show between the dinner courses. Henried teaches her sentimental European folk songs—Ida speaks a little French—and in return she gives Paul the lowdown on some old English ditty. Some time a movie magnate will drop in, and the next morning they will be cast in a super-musical, legs, songs, technicolor and all. At the studio Lupino and Henried are always concocting corny jokes such as telling Humphrey Bogart that they've heard a terrible rumor about him. Of course, they haven't, but who wouldn't be frightened in these days? Ida loves people with a sense of humor—that is what she liked so much about Louis Hayward, from the beginning.

"He was always a good sport even when I did get angry. He told me to stop bleaching my hair, and he cured my shyness. Five years ago I wouldn't have walked alone into the studio commissary, much less a party."

If you knew what an amazing transformation Ida has gone through, from the ugly little duckling she was to one of our leading glamor divas, you'd give Louis Hayward all the credit he deserves. She is proud of Louis. He enlisted without publicity and picture-in-uniform.

"He'd been recovering from bronchitis. He was afraid the doctors might send him back, and so he went under the sun lamp for hours and burned himself out until he was sure they wouldn't say no."

She writes every day and sends him telegrams, driving the Western Union people crazy with her requests to change the fixed wordage. "They wouldn't even let me put in affectionately and such things."

She is a second lieutenant in the Women's Ambulance Corps, works at the Hollywood Canteen, appears in camp shows. She doesn't talk much about her war work. To her it's a matter-of-course. On Sundays she swims, works in her victory garden, and dances with her sister Rita. Or they put on a weird and wonderful home show, with her mother, the famous Connie Emerald, taking part. "Oh, we are wonderfully mad," Ida says. "The Lupinos always were. Our family tree is full of crazy people for centuries, many of them hanging up from its branches where they belong."

She came to Hollywood after playing murderesses and similar cheerful characters in British pictures. In one of her films there was one scene where she portrayed a demure, noble character, by way of fun. Somebody saw that scene, sent it to Hollywood and said, "There is your Alice-in-Wonderland." They sent for her. By the time she arrived they knew the truth about the sweet little lamb, and she didn't play Alice after all. Her greatest break came when William Wellman gave her the part of Bessie, the neurotic barmaid who slashed the artist's masterpiece in "The Light That Failed." She walked right into Mr. Wellman's office and gave such a convincing, horrible performance of a crazy girl that Mr. Wellman's blood ran in reverse.

Which proves what we said in the beginning, that Ida Lupino is far from being mad. Only an exceedingly clever and sober-minded person could have staged that act, performing it with such workmanlike, splendid perfection.

In other words, she is an artist, not a mad woman. We prefer the artist . . . and we think that you will, too.

THE END

STUDY IN PERPETUAL EMOTION

between her rounded cheeks. Her lips are pursed and red. And there's the vitality.

Dona is the most restless and volatile person to reach Hollywood in years. There's never a dull moment around Dona; not even one that's slightly blunt. She never stands still, and she never stops talking. "Stand" is used instead of sit, because Dona has never been known to sit. She pops in and out of chairs, never lingering sufficiently long to leave an impression on the seat.

Along with her protective instinct, Dona is a Soldier of Causes. She always has something or other she's battling about. Most recently it has been that letter "N" which was mentioned some time back. And that brings us around, quite neatly, to the subject of names, and we might as well mention all five of Miss Drake's names right here and now.

She was born Rita Novella. When she broke into show business, she called herself Una Vilon. As a band leader she was Rita Rio. She made a picture debut as Rita Shaw. And then she became Dona Drake. Remember that there's only one "N," please!

"Dona," says Dona, rapidly, "has only one 'N.' You pronounce it like the 'dough' in 'doughnut' and add an 'uh.' 'Donna'—which is Donna Reed—she just got married, didn't she?—is 'Don'—like a boy's name—and 'uh' at the end. Get it? I'm Dona—with one 'N.' She's Donna—with two, and a husband, I think."

That's the way Dona-with-the-one-N talks. Fast and rambling. No nonsense, no contemplation, no worries that her answer might be the "wrong thing."

She'd rather talk about Dorothy Lamour than anyone or anything else, which isn't surprising. Dorothy got Dona her chance on the screen.

"A whole year I waited around in this town, trying to get a job," she explains. "A whole year . . . and I couldn't even get inside a producer's office! I know a lotta kids have been trying longer than that. But me! I had a little reputation. I had my own band for more than three years. I'd been all over the country. But Dorothy got in even when my agent couldn't."

If you want to hear how Dorothy got Dona in, you'll have to wait a minute. Miss Drake is volatile, but she isn't always coherent. "D" not only stands for "Dona" and "Drake" but also for "digression."

"Want to hear why I came to Hollywood?" she demands and races off without waiting for a reply. "I had my band, like I told you. On my last tour I took Faith Bacon, Marie Wilson, and Toby Wing with me. Flash stuff, see? Did I work! Me and Orrel—that's Orrel Johnson, my band manager—made the bookings, arranged the transportation, got everybody loaded in the bus, met the dates, saw to the hotels, found the food, played the dances. I knocked my brains out. I led the band, and I sang and danced. And when the tour was over, Faith and Marie and Toby had the money, and all I had was an approximate nervous breakdown. So I came to Hollywood to pick up some of that easy money they were always talking about."

Dona landed in Hollywood on March 14, 1940, and on March 14, 1941, she signed her Paramount contract. Thanks to Miss Lamour. Dottie, who always seems to be doing nice things for somebody, had seen Dona at a party. She had known her from New York, and they resumed old friendships.

"And do you know what happened?" demands Miss Drake. "The next day she went to Mr. DeSylva—he's head of Paramount—and told him she knew just the girl to play her friend in 'Aloma of the South Seas.'

"'It's Rita Rio, the band leader,' she said.

"'I know her,' said Mr. DeSylva. 'She's a band leader, not an actress.'

"'She can act,' said Dorothy. And she got me a screen test and the part. Funny thing, later on Paramount was going to make 'Louisiana Purchase.' Somebody said that Drake kid—my name had been changed from Rita Rio to Rita Shaw and to Dona Drake by then—could sing the title song and be queen of the Mardi Gras. Know what Mr. DeSylva said?

"Oh, the little girl in 'Aloma.' She's not a singer—she's an actress!' But don't get me wrong. Mr. DeSylva's a great guy. He gave me the chance . . . and he's been picking up my options, too."

Miss Drake's performances in "Road to Morocco," "Star Spangled Rhythm," and the now-in-production "Salute For Three" apparently are sufficient reason for Paramount, in the person of Mr. DeSylva, to hold those options.

Dona (or Rita or Una) was born in Mexico City, November 5, 1920. Jose and Enocia Novella, her parents, were in the restaurant business, and when Dona was five they moved to New York with their not inconsiderable brood. Gothamites didn't take kindly to the tortillas, frijoles, and tamales which Papa Jose prepared with such delicate care, so before long it was necessary for various of the children to find jobs.

Renee, one of the daughters, landed with N.T.G. in his club. All of the Novellas were musicians and dancers of sorts. Dona herself plays the piano "pretty well," the trumpet "just fair" and the clarinet "lousy." So when she was thirteen, Dona joined N.T.G.'s troupe. Changing her name, of course. It became Una Vilon, the first because she liked it and the last because it was the name her sister's best friend, also in the show, was using.

In 1936 Dona decided that if she could play three musical instruments, she ought to be able to find another girl or so who could handle an equal amount, and thus a band was born. John Hyde, who booked the band, decided Dona's current name—it was Una Vilon, wasn't it?—was not suitable, and switched it to Rita Rio.

That was all right with Dona, but it confused a number of masters of ceremonies, who constantly introduced her as Rita Rio to various assemblages in night clubs, colleges, lodges, and other places of assembly.

"I didn't," confesses Dona, "know any more about leading a band than I know about shooting pool, and that isn't much. So I led it. I just held the stick and waved myself. They seemed to like it."

They liked it for three and one-half years, at which point came the aforementioned Faith Bacon-Marie Wilson-Toby Wing episode which sent Dona scurrying to Hollywood and her screen debut.

Dona can say, with admirable frankness, that her visits to Hollywood night clubs have been rare.

"Can't stand 'em," she admits freely. "I worked in too many. They're full of stale cigarette smoke, drunks, and gossip. I don't want any part of the three of them."

Dona's first house in Hollywood was a tiny bungalow high atop a hill with a magnificent view and no neighbors within one hundred yards. In fact, the address was so obscure that few could find it, which happened to be just what Dona wanted. There she lived with her cocker spaniel, "Jackie," her two Siamese cats "Ama" and "Pola," and a brace of white rabbits—"Hug" and "Kiss"—which, on occasion, felt the call of the near-by wild and disappeared into the sagebrush for indefinite periods. Since the incident of the sixty-five cats and the A-card, Dona has moved close to town.

She still has the livestock, which continues to be a problem. She will erupt violently from any party at five p.m. to dash home and feed the various pets, unless she previously has persuaded Miss Johnson, who is now an agent in Hollywood, to perform that duty for her.

This expose on Miss Drake may have built in you an enthusiasm for her, a desire to meet her. If so, there must be one word of caution added.

Miss Drake is an excellent rifle and revolver shot. She practices daily. She is also an expert with a left hook and a right cross. She started boxing with her brothers when she was a youngster. And she hasn't stopped.

So maybe you'd better spell it with one "N." Okay, Dona?

his horror, that New York was almost as clean as Washington. Every house he went to had just been freshly painted.

But New York meant that he could tramp from one theatrical producer to another for the doubtful pleasure of sitting hour after hour in an unfriendly outer office. This was bad enough in the summer. When the winter came, Joe—who needless to say had hocked his overcoat—began thinking of a warmer climate.

His thought was translated into action when a friendly furniture store owner (who didn't buy any paint) offered to pay half of Cotten's round trip fare (excursion) to Miami, if Joe would give the return half of the ticket to the furniture man's daughter, who was happily stranded there. Joe jumped at the opportunity and took the first southbound train. He had exactly two dollars in cash and many high resolves for the future.

But some one on the train started a poker game, and in no time Joe's two dollars were gone—and also his return ticket! Fortunately, the furniture dealer's daughter, who was carrying on with a saxophone player, was in no hurry to go home. Joe, caught up in the fever of buying and selling, which was agitating Miami in those days, went into the real estate business himself.

He made enough the first week to buy the stranded daughter the return ticket, much to her annoyance, and then proceeded to live the hectic existence of a Florida realtor.

He didn't, however, neglect his theatre. Nights he acted in the Miami Civic Theatre, a semi-professional group. It was here Joe met Lenore Kipp. In the years BC (Before Cotten), Miss Kipp had been disposed to look down her aristocratic nose at theatrical folk. In all probability, she would have continued that commendable attitude had not Fate intervened in the form of a charity production. Miss Kipp, as accomplished a pianist as she was dazzling a socialite, agreed to supply off-stage music at the Miami Civic Theatre.

To her surprise, she liked the experience—and Cotten. She went further. She told Joe he was a great actor and belonged on the stage. With the help of Lenore, he collected letters to the "right people" in New York and trekked northward.

This was the Second Cotten Invasion. Hopefully he went after the "right people," only to discover that their outer offices were even more unfriendly than the producers he'd attempted to see during his first invasion.

He made fruitless calls on producers, managers, agents. Fruitless, that is, until he happened to barge in on David Belasco, of all people. The maestro greeted him like a long-lost friend. It was clearly a case of mistaken identity, but Joe was in no mood to quibble. When the producer asked Joe to trail along to a rehearsal at his 44th Street Theatre, Joe did so gladly.

In the Theatre, Belasco repeatedly asked Cotten's opinion on everything.

"Mr. Cotten," Belasco would ask deferentially, "don't you think it would be more effective if those costumes were blue instead of green?"

"I certainly do," Cotten would agree heartily. Whereupon Belasco would have the costumes changed.

Cotten never did find out just who Belasco thought he was, but he must have pleased the old man for he was made assistant stage manager and understudy to the late Lynne Overman in "Dancing Partner." Later, he understudied in "Tonight or Never."

Joe admits he was probably the only understudy on record who prayed every night that the star would not get pneumonia or be hit by a truck. The very thought of taking over an Overman role set his teeth chattering and knees shaking.

"I don't know why," ruminated Joe, "but I was sure I'd never remember anything! And, at the same time I was dying to act. I guess it was sort of inverted stage fright."

Yet Cotten successfully concealed his fright from Belasco who kept him busy until Belasco's death.

The lean days came again, and they were mighty lean.

In 1931, Joe was engaged by the Copley Square Players of Boston as their leading man. This looked like steady work; so he and Lenore Kipp were married. But because the company manager believed that leading men were better box office if they were single, the news was kept secret, and Lenore was cheated out of a honeymoon.

It was shortly after this that Joe got his first real New York break. He was given the role of the collegian in "Accent On Youth." The part almost became a career for the actor. He played it for years. He couldn't get away from it. Once even, when he had a two hour stop-over in an upstate New York town, he visited the local theatre, where "Accent" was playing, just to kill time. He dropped backstage for a moment to visit with the boys and girls, only to learn that the actor playing the collegian had just been removed to the hospital. In the emergency Cotten took over the role, "for tonight, only." But the two-hour stopover became a two weeks' engagement.

Then the bottom fell out of legitimate theatre, and the Cottens had to tighten their belts. Joe was all for quitting acting entirely. He told me seriously, "The landlord and grocer were beginning to question my choice of a career."

It was about this time that Cotten met Welles, leaving the Boy Genius only to go into "The Philadelphia Story" with Katharine Hepburn. It was a miracle that he and the fiery Katie hit it off well together. But I can understand it. It's that "Joe" quality.

In the year of 1940 when Welles arrived in Hollywood to harry the old guard by producing, writing, directing, and acting in "Citizen Kane," he asked for Cotten as his co-lead. Two other major studios wanted Cotten, too, but their representatives lacked the persuasiveness of Welles.

"You just don't say 'no' to Orson," Cotten explained simply. "He'd be beating tom-toms under your window if you did."

He took the part even though another studio offered him a role on the "old folks" side. Joe told the studio, "I don't want to be the poor man's George Arliss. If I'm going to be a poor man's anything, I'd rather be the poor man's Cary Grant."

Now you know that he's neither. He's Joseph Cotten, star in his own right. And that ain't bad!

simplicity, its femininity, and its practicality. You can do it yourself.

We hope you absorbed the lesson on how to set pincurls from your first visit to Movieland's Beauty Parlor, in the September issue, because Brenda sets the sides of her hair in flat pincurls, and the ends of the back hair in large pincurls.

She pushes the front hair into a half wave, as close to the forehead line as possible, so that when it is brushed and combed it won't stretch out and be too far back from the forehead. Ends are then set in pincurls, all going in the same direction.

In actual dressing of the hair, Brenda makes a half-part at the center back of her head, brushing all the hair upward and to the front. Notice her clever use of a comb to keep the smooth, sleek look in back. Hair from in front of the ears is brushed smoothly upward, and pinned with bobby pins to have a slight lift. All of the loose curls Brenda arranges flatly over the top of the head, holding them smoothly in place with pins.

Easy, isn't it?

One admonition: Don't try this hairdress if your hairline isn't what it should be. If you have a widow's peak, then do uncover it and show it off to the world, because there's nothing that arouses more consistent sighs of envy from your feminine friends nor more admiration from the man in your life than a beautiful forehead and hairline.

EXERCISE OF THE MONTH:

Are you a swivel-chair worker? Of course, you don't have to be in order to have bad posture, but it helps.

As a matter of fact, no matter what your occupation is, it's well to realize that good posture is based upon trained and adequate muscles. Those back muscles that one takes for granted have a tendency to become flabby and are then not strong enough to hold you up straight. What is true of the back muscles is just as true of the muscles of the trunk and abdomen. They just get plain tired of having no attention paid them!

Hollywood has many stars who are shining examples of good posture. All have regular exercises to which they adhere. From among them, we chose three simple, easy-to-do routines from Columbia's Janet Blair.

Lying on the flat of her back, legs straight out and feet close together, Janet takes a deep breath and raises her chest high. Keeping her chest up, she exhales by pulling her abdomen in hard. And if you don't think that's a long stride toward that flat tummy you long for we'll hurry on to the second exercise. It's a little tougher, but what wonders it performs!

In the same position as for Exercise No. 1, Janet bends her knees and pulls her feet up. She then pulls her abdomen in hard, and relaxes it part way. Do it often enough, and you'll have the hard, tough abdominal muscles that sneer at the sight of a girdle.

And for those of you who sit and sit and sit some more, Janet offers another. Of all things, it's done while sitting! Quite an idea, getting your corrective exercises while at work!

Seated in a chair, Janet inclines her trunk forward from the hips, keeping her spine straight. (Best to place your hands lightly on the hips, with elbows out, for this one.) She relaxes and repeats this over a ten-minute interval.

This is the position, of course, which should be taken at all times when you're bending forward to write or to any other kind of desk work. You don't have to make a special ritual of it. Just remember that correct posture while at work is not only an ounce of prevention but more than a pound of cure.

situation when Barbara, all spiffed up in a new dress—very tailored—and a new pair of No. 18 coupon shoes, enters. "I'm ready," she says with just the proper mixture of expectancy and pride.

"Good," says Bob, beaming at her, but seeing—according to Barbara—only the Stanwyck face and hair.

Afterward she is likely to report to the intimate little group with whom she and Bob spend their spare time, "He never notices what I'm wearing. He never comments on my new dresses."

"Like Fred," chimes in Mrs. MacMurray. "As bad as Jack," announces Mary Benny. "Ray is the same way," sums up Mal Milland.

Perhaps colleges should institute courses in "Male Appreciation of Female Clothes"—by Adrian and not by Ann Corio.

Sundays hereafter will be dull affairs for Barbara and Bob, each musing—wherever he is—upon a certain cement mixing machine. Bob will swear that his last several civilian Sundays were spent in a most unorthodox manner.

But to go back a bit. Last spring Bob decided to plant a victory garden —early. His notion of what the well-dressed kitchen garden will wear started with radishes, progressed through the onion, carrot, and beet departments, and returned to the radishes. He planted little red ones and the white icicle type. The only trouble with the icicles was that they started life with delusions of grandeur: they thought they were baseball bats. No fooling, Bob had to dig some of them with a spade. When they were excavated, they proved to be as long as one of Mischa Auer's arms.

The enterprise of such horticulture will give you some idea of what monstrous weeds grew in the same soil. Barbara daily complained that Bob should do something about the buffalo grass, the sweet clover, and the miscellaneous widgets. They were heartier than redwoods.

Then one day Barbara came home to find the entire garden, weeds and all, gone. Frames were set up, gravel was piled neatly by, and Bob's next scene found him busily cementing in the space formerly devoted to di Maggio radishes. The result was so neat that Barbara was thrilled. It also was evidence of Mr. Taylor's new enthusiam for the cement mixer.

"Every Sunday from then on," Bob told listeners on the "Song of Russia" set, "I had to pour a little cement to cover up a space in which some bush had died and been uprooted." He rubbed his chin, stubbled for his role. "I'm going to miss that cement mixer," he said.

Another miss—a serious one—will be the luscious food he gets at Chez Taylor. Now Barbara is perfectly satisfied with any old viand so long as it is steak. A pink steak (remember the day?) is her idea of a well balanced meal. However, Bob is the gourmet personified. He likes goulash with all the incidentals. A baked potato must have the pulp removed, mashed, mixed with chopped mushrooms, diced green peppers, a touch of hardboiled egg. Then this mixture should be returned to the shell, covered with cheese, and lightly heated.

A salad, you say? The Taylor mixture: lettuce, celery, water cress, romaine, diced avacado, tomato, slices of American and Swiss cheese, miscellaneous slices of last night's roast beef, ham, or pork, a dash of paprika, a dash of marjoram, a few canned mushrooms, and a fancy dressing.

Cauliflower, to Bob's palate, is a failure unless it arrives in floods of Hollandaise sauce. Ever taste escalloped potatoes with a dash of horseradish sauce? Ever eat beef a la Strogonoff?

Barbara, at home (where the cook is a genius) or at one of the rare restaurants Bob enjoys, spent Bob's last civilian months watching him enjoy a series of exotic dishes. "In the Navy," observed his wife sarcastically, "you'll get all these involved foods. Yes, every one!"

Barbara is going to miss Bob's monitoring of her burning pockets. You see, she is the type of girl who gives gifts. She goes shopping in Beverly Hills to buy half a dozen hankies for herself, and she comes home with twenty-two packages, all for other people. She just can't resist buying that item which seems to belong—by its very nature—to one of her friends. She's a spendthrift in the Santa Claus tradition.

Bob is more conservative. He has usually bought what he wanted, but he has always kept a strict eye on the balance sheet. So much for recreation, so much for necessities, so much for investment. He and Barbara have a business manager who praises Bob, but keeps an eye on the Little Woman —occasionally telephoning her and sending her into guilty panic.

But the biggest miss in the new life of the Taylors will be their inability to hold a post mortem over every picture they see. Ordinarily they attend several movies a week. On the way home they dissect the opus, scene by scene. It has long been considered fashionable in Hollywood for stars to say, with ennui, that they have one unbroken family rule: no shop talk.

Both Barbara and Bob scoff at such pretense. Their business is pictures, and they are vitally interested in every phase of picture-making. "When I get too darned old to act, I want to direct and produce," Bob has said with reference to his post-war plans.

Incidentally, on the "Song of Russia" set Bob celebrated his final day in pictures for the duration by giving every member of the cast and crew a war bond. And Bob's fellow workers, in a clear demonstration of the esteem in which he is held, gave him a handsome leather naval dispatch case.

After Bob's basic training is completed and he has been transferred to a permanent base (permanent for three months, that is), you will undoubtedly hear that Barbara has joined him.

She'll fly to that particular point; she'll be in a dither, but she won't want to waste a moment. She'll cook fancy dishes for her husband; she'll report all her latest cementings and other expenditures; she'll give him a brief resume of the recent pictures.

That will ease the loneliness a bit until the war is over and the Taylors can resume one of the best home-life relationships in Hollywood.

The End

some of it lies in his change in friends. His closest buddy, Bruce Cabot, is gone to war. His other close pal, Pat di Cicco, very happily and quietly married to young Gloria Vanderbilt, is also in service. Possibly Flynn's closest friend these days is Helmut Dantine, the young Austrian actor who has made a name for himself playing Nazi villians. Having been in a concentration camp, Dantine knows Nazis and their plans for world dominion. He and Flynn spend hours discussing world politics, the "century of the common man" and other subjects usually restricted to council tables. This is not the kind of talk that used to swirl around Errol's pre-war night club tables.

Then there is Mexico. That is Errol's greatest enthusiasm of the moment. He used to suffer from wanderlust, wanting to move constantly from place to place between pictures, by plane or on his yacht. Today Errol hies himself to Mexico as quickly as possible after each picture and remains until called back for the next one.

Acapulco, on the West Coast, is his favorite city because of the splendid fishing facilities. Underwater fishing, for which he dons goggles and webbed feet, and carries a spear, takes up most of his time.

Each week-end, when a plane seat is available, he flies from Acapulco to Mexico City for the bull fight. He is friendly with Antonio Jarza, who was Mexico's greatest bull fighter until his retirement, and with Silverio, hailed now as the world's greatest matador. Errol invariably occupies a box on the shady side of the ring, immediately beneath that of the judges, and has become a prime favorite with the crowds.

At night he visits either the Reforma or the Ritz, where most Americans gather while in Mexico City, and on Sundays he usually journeys to Cuernavaca, the spa made famous as the place where Charles Lindbergh wooed and won Anne Morrow. There he visits the historic castle, started by the conqueror, Cortez, in 1519. Either that or he takes time to visit Fortin, a tiny hamlet on the way to Vera Cruz, which is said to be the most wonderful orchid and gardenia garden in the world.

There is, of course, no predicting what Flynn will do. He probably does not know his own plans from hour to hour, so completely is he a creature of impulse. Yet he is undoubtedly speaking the truth when he says that he has not yet met the woman he wants to marry. Little Nora Eddington, who ran the cigar counter in the Hall of Justice in Los Angeles, was pretty enough to attract him. But in his new, more serious life, he would seem to seek more than physical beauty from the girl he would wed. After all, Damita has more than beauty. She is a witty, sophisticated woman, Damita, and was a star in her own right when she married Errol. There are not many women, even in Hollywood, who have as many faceted a personality as Lili Damita, but Flynn with his flair for the romantic and picturesque will forever seek perfection until he finds it.

Meanwhile both war and fatherhood are leaving their mark upon him. In the wild, sprawling estate on a remote Hollywood hillside which he calls "The Farm," he lives in his newly quiet manner. It is actually a well stocked, working farm, with its pens of live stock, its corrals of horses. It reflects the Flynn who is not generally known, the Flynn he has somewhat deliberately hidden from the public. Maybe it is this Flynn who is beginning to show through the swashbuckling veneer these days.

Quiz for Women Absentees who can't keep going on "problem days"

Do's and don'ts to help you feel better and stay on the job!

A WAR PLANT NURSE WROTE KOTEX that their greatest number of absentees are women who miss 1 to 3 days of work each month, frequently on "problem days". She asked "Can you help these women – and a million like them?"

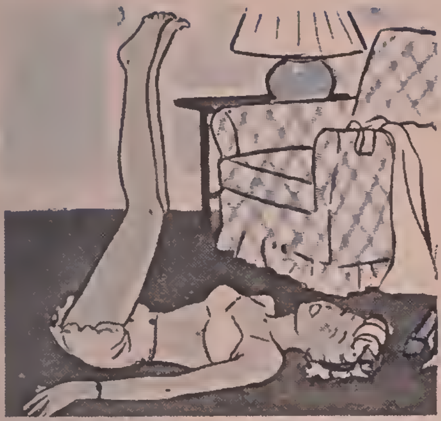
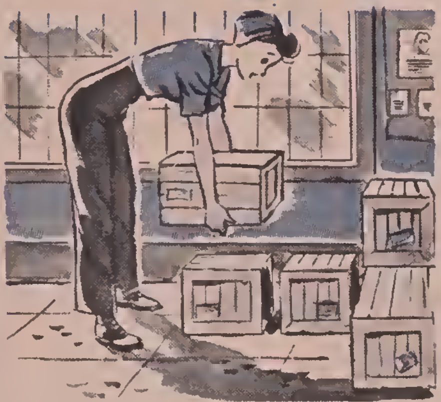
We take pride in being able to bring you this authoritative information on how to feel better and stay on the job. It's especially important now, when there's no time for lost days. And we take pride, too, that more women choose Kotex sanitary napkins than all other brands of pads put together—to help them keep going in comfort!*



Do you exercise for cramps? Setting-ups can be worth their weight in hot-water bottles to relieve cramps and congestion (help posture and beauty, too). For complete directions get the new booklet "That Day Is Here Again." Free with compliments of Kotex.



Do you lift like this? This is the dangerous way! There's a knack in avoiding strain. Bend knees, keep back straight, tummy in. Get close to object, under it if possible. Lift up, parallel with body. In carrying, divide weight evenly or shift from left to right.

Do you get your feet wet? Avoid wet feet . . . chills . . . catching cold . . . at this time of the month, especially! When you have a stormy-weather date, you needn't take a rain check if you remember to wear your rubbers and carry an umbrella.

Do you take showers? Put warm showers on your "Do" list (not cold, not hot). That goes for tub or sponge baths, too. Luke-warm water's not only relaxing . . . it's a daily "must." At this time, particularly, perspiration glands work overtime!

Do you get plenty of sleep? Sleep, sister, sleep . . . at least 8 hours. Plenty of shut-eye is important, not only now but every night. And after a hard day's work, stretch—yawn—relax—when you turn in. It helps "unknot" tense muscles.

What about cocktails? Too much stimulation is bad for a working girl at any time. "High" today means low tomorrow. (Nature drives a hard bargain). And on "problem days," especially, that logey, let-down feeling is just what a woman should avoid.

(★T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.)

The METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

Whether or not you care about that hick town called New York, those of you who are show-minded will appreciate the amazing demonstration of public interest in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures that's taking place.

★ ★ ★ ★

The main stem, the white way, the hardened artery or whatever you dub the crossroads of the world boasts several first run motion picture theatres. And with only a few exceptions each theatre is playing an M-G-M attraction.

★ ★ ★ ★

At the Astor—the de luxe long run house—they're still playing M-G-M's "Thousands Cheer" which has everything that is anything. More stars than there are in heaven.

★ ★ ★ ★

At the Radio City Music Hall, they're playing "Lassie Come Home"—Eric Knight's remarkable story filmed in technicolor with a perfect cast that includes Roddy McDowall, Donald Crisp, Dame May Whitty, Edmund Gwenn, Nigel Bruce and Elsa Lanchester.

★ ★ ★ ★

At the Capitol—at the moment of going to press—they're still talking about the run of the gay and tuneful "DuBarry Was A Lady". At the Globe they're finishing the nth week of "Salute To The Marines". At the State they've just ended "Swing Shift Maisie" and at the Rialto, "Hitler's Madman". At the Paramount they're playing the Red Skelton-Eleanor Powell-Jimmy Dorsey musical comedy "I Dood It".

★ ★ ★ ★

So you see it was a legitimate celebration they held, changing the name of Broadway to M-G-M Way.

★ ★ ★ ★

With the attractions coming, every Main Street in America will go M-G-M—which is the way they should go.

"Girl Crazy" is about to tread the boards—or rather grace the screens—of all the best theatres. We think you'll go for this one also.

★ ★ ★ ★

Mickey Rooney and Judy Garland do their stuff in a way that is delicious, delightful and de-lovely. They got rhythm.

★ ★ ★ ★

As for us—we've always been on the M-G-M bandwagon.

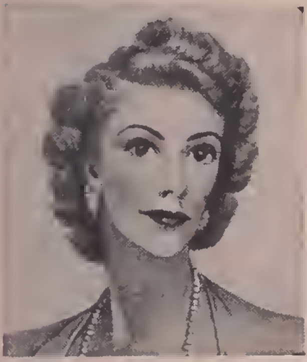
War, Women and Lipstick—



A recent portrait of Constance Luft Huhn by Maria de Kammerer

by CONSTANCE LUFT HUHN
Head of the House of Tangee

For the first time in history woman-power is a factor in war. Millions of you are fighting and working side by side with your men.

In fact, you are doing double duty—for you are still carrying on your traditional "woman's" work of cooking, and cleaning, and home-making. Yet, somehow, American women are still the loveliest and most spirited in the world. The best dressed, the best informed, the best looking.

It's a reflection of the free democratic way of life that you have succeeded in keeping your femininity—even though you are doing man's work!

If a symbol were needed of this fine, independent spirit—of this courage and strength—I would choose a lipstick. It is one of those mysterious little essentials that have an importance far beyond their size or cost.

A woman's lipstick is an instrument of personal morale that helps her to conceal heartbreak or sorrow; gives her self-confidence when it's badly needed; heightens her loveliness when she wants to look her loveliest.

No lipstick—ours or anyone else's—will win the war. But it symbolizes one of the reasons why we are fighting...the precious right of women to be feminine and lovely—under any circumstances.

The Tangee Satin-Finish Lipstick of your choice will keep your lips smoother... longer! It will bring an exclusive grooming and a deep glowing "life" to your lips that defy both time and weather.

BEAUTY—glory of woman...
LIBERTY—glory of nations...
Protect them both...

EDITOR . . . ON VACATION

Jerry Lester, radio comedian, thanks Ruth Waterbury for recent Movieland award which was given to him.

Paula Stone and Jerry Wayne chat at Stork Club party.

Also at the party honoring Movieland's editor was Ona Munson, right, talking with a friend.

MOST movie editors go to Hollywood to visit, but MOVIELAND'S editor, Ruth Waterbury, goes to New York to visit, and when she does, it's one busy, gay time.

During her recent eight-day stay in New York she shopped, saw plays, gave interviews to movie trade paper reporters, guest-commentated on radio programs—but the big event was a cocktail party at the Stork Club given in her honor by her publishers, Hillman Periodicals.

Adventures of
LONGINES
THE WORLD'S MOST HONORED WATCH
The watch that was recalled to service*

Thousands of men bought their first Longines strap watches while serving in World War I. The Longines military watch above was bought by an American Artillery Officer from the Quartermaster Corps in France in 1918 and received its baptism of fire in the decisive St. Mihiel and Meuse-Argonne battles. For 10 years after the war, it shared the rough and ready life on a Montana ranch, and then it was put aside ¶Suddenly, the years of peace ran out and war came again. Our Artillery Officer was called for active duty, and the old Longines military watch was recalled to service. ¶Countless of such incidents have made the reputation of Longines watches—for keeping good time for a long, long time.

AFTER THE WAR IS OVER

Soldier John Payne, who has left a trail of broken hearts in movieland ever since his divorce from Anne Shirley, has it bad and doesn't care who knows it.

Pretty Elyse Knox, ex-wife of Paul Hesse, handsome photographer, is the girl. In a town of beautiful women Elyse is so particularly beautiful she stands out.

According to John, she could have a wart on her nose and he wouldn't care. He says she is the sweetest girl in the world. I can qualify the statement just a little bit and still admit Elyse is mighty sweet. Both John and Elyse, with broken marriages behind them, are very much suited for each other, and plan to marry on the completion of the war.

Universal is slowly building Elyse toward stardom, so perhaps Johnny will return from battle to take as his bride a big movie star. This is the headache in the situations, for double careers were the reason of the breaking of both their previous marriages.

STIFLER FROM SUTHERLAND

A would-be actor was complaining to Director Eddie Sutherland about the injustices of the movie industry. "Take so-and-so," he said, naming a topflight actor, "he ruins every part he gets."

"Maybe so," Sutherland stifled the complainer with, "but frankly, I'd rather see him ruin a part than you save it."

"Reunion in Hollywood" you might call this shot of Norma Shearer and Major Ben Lyon.

The handsome man with the medals dancing with Bonita Granville? Yes, Lt. John Carroll.

Mother of Four Earns $1,000 on Her Writing

"Without jeopardizing our home life a bit, I have been able to earn $1,000 since graduating from N.I.A. If I had not the responsibility of four small children, home duties, and war work, I am sure I could have made much more. After only two lessons, I sold a garden series to Baltimore American. The N.I.A. way makes writing child's play." — Gladys Carr, Annapolis, Md.

HOW do you KNOW you can't WRITE?

Have you ever tried?

Have you ever attempted even the least bit of training, under competent guidance?

Or have you been sitting back, as it is so easy to do, waiting for the day to come when you will awaken, all of a sudden, to the discovery, "I am a writer"?

If the latter course is the one of your choosing, you probably never will write. Lawyers must be law clerks. Doctors must be internes. Engineers must be draftsmen. We all know that, in our time, the egg does come before the chicken.

It is seldom that anyone becomes a writer until he (or she) has been writing for some time. That is why so many authors and writers spring up out of the newspaper business. The day-to-day necessity of writing—of gathering material about which to write—develops their talent, their insight, their background and their confidence as nothing else could.

That is why the Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on journalism—continuous writing—the training that has produced so many successful authors.

Learn to write by writing

NEWSPAPER Institute training is based on the New York Copy Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. Week by week you receive actual assignments, just as if you were right at work on a great metropolitan daily. Your writing is individually corrected and constructively criticized. Thoroughly experienced, practical, active writers are responsible for this instruction. Under such sympathetic guidance, you will find that (instead of vainly trying to copy some one else's writing tricks) you are rapidly developing your own distinctive, self-flavored style—undergoing an experience that has a thrill to it and which at the same time develops in you the power to make your feelings articulate.

Many people who should be writing become awestruck by fabulous stories about millionaire authors and therefore give little thought to the $25, $50 and $100 or more that can often be earned for material that takes little time to write—stories, articles on business, sports, war activities, civilian defense, recipes, etc.—things that can easily be turned out in leisure hours, and often on the impulse of the moment.

A chance to test yourself

Our unique Writing Aptitude Test tells whether you possess the fundamental qualities necessary to successful writing—acute observation, dramatic instinct, creative imagination, etc. You'll enjoy taking this test. COTTEN CAN'T COMPLAIN

It costs a small fee for any woman who wants to visit Claudette Colbert on the set of "Since You Went Away." Claudette couldn't understand her new found popularity with some of her wilder-eyed girlfriends who would call to lunch with her at the studio or to see her on the set.

She soon discovered that they really came just to watch Joe Cotten act. It seems Joe is the new feminine rave and all the girls just want to see him.

Thrifty Claudette said, "Come one, come all, but it will cost." She gets a dollar per dame and is putting it in a fund to be given to the Red Cross at the end of the picture.

In the meantime the nice Mr. Cotten squirms under their glances and knows it is for a good cause.

PEOPLE LIVE IN UNFURNISHED HOUSES

Newlyweds, that is. It's all due to the general furniture shortage and the war.

For instance, the other day Laraine Day took a reporter through her new Santa Monica Canyon house. "There will be two lovely green couches here," Laraine said. "Over in the corner will be a French Provincial dish closet. Here in this corner is a charming commode. I will be anxious to show them to you when I get it all together. Some of the furniture will be here next month, but it will take three months to get the highboy."

The reporter asked Miss Day whether he could sit in her garden and wait until it all arrived, and whether she would supply his change of costume to match the seasons!

When you run out of matches, do this. At least Anne Shirley is trying to get a light from the lamp Lt. Richard Walker is holding for her.

And Betty Hutton seems to have found a leading man who is good looking and also obliging concerning Betty's looks. Barry Sullivan.

NEW MEN IN THE MOVIES

Anyone visiting Paramount studios these days is given a load on the subject of new-discovery Sunny Tufts. Paramount is whooping the tall, blond Sunny as their greatest discovery since Alan Ladd, and even whisper that "maybe he's even greater than Ladd."

As a matter of fact, Mr. Tufts is excellent and then some in his initial picture "So Proudly We Hail" (which Movieland's review department strongly recommends you to see). But in that same picture there also debuts George Reeves, who also is excellent. In fact, he's handsomer than Sunny and not so stylized in his work. But you'll hear no eulogies about Reeves at Paramount.

Why? Because George Reeves can't be promoted now. He's in the Army. Tufts, being a father, is draft exempt.

You can't blame any company for pushing whatever male performers they have. But it does make you wonder about the fine actors who were just starting, and who will have to start all over when the war is over.

The newest crop of established Hollywood personalities to leave for service this past month are Brian Aherne, going to be a flight instructor; Richard Carlson, enlisted in the Navy months ago and finally called up, leaving his wife and two babies behind. It is rumored that John Wayne, particularly with trouble at home, is to leave soon. Joel McCrea is talking of retiring for the duration to raise cattle for the government.

Fortunately there are new discoveries coming up to take their places: that very important Robert Walker at MGM; Jess Barker at Columbia and Bill Carter at the same studio (Bill has a medical discharge), that smash hit, Donald O'Connor at Universal. These boys are worth seeing and their futures couldn't be rosier.

FIRST WAR VETERAN AT CAMP

Bravery and finenesses are two characteristics that express that charming Herbert Marshall. Recently while on a picture location in Reno, Nevada, Marshall with Bonita Granville and Mickey Rooney went out to a nearby Army camp to entertain.

Marshall was the last to appear on the bill, and the only way to get to the stage was up a flight of very shaky stairs.

Marshall stood at the bottom of the stairs, without a microphone and told the boys that it would be impossible for him to get on the stage because of a leg injury he had in the last war. If they didn't mind, he said, listening to him from where he was standing that he would do his act.

Amid cheers he did it and even topped Rooney, which is one of the toughest things to do in this picture business.

MOVIELAND'S New PICTURE GUIDE

FLESH AND FANTASY (Universal) is a compilation of inter-related stories of supernatural and mystic phenomena. It marks the bow of Charles Boyer as a producer, and he also is a member of the all-star cast which includes Barbara Stanwyck, Edward G. Robinson, Robert Benchley, Betty Field, Robert Cummings, and Thomas Mitchell. The picture is far from a perfect work, yet it is to be hailed for its courage in opening a treasury of stories which have long been overlooked by the screen, tales from folklore that may well stimulate your imagination by their very unreality.

Three tales of mystic circumstances are under discussion by a pair of clubmen. The first relates the Mardi Gras adventure of a desperate girl who is saved from suicide by the materialization of a supernatural presence. The second tells of the plight of a man who knows his destiny is to commit a murder, and the last is about a circus performer who saw a beautiful woman in a dream of his destruction, later to meet this same beauty.

RIDING HIGH (Paramount) is an excursion to an Arizona dude ranch in typical musical comedy fashion. The fact that "Riding High" was once exactly that — a Broadway musical comedy — is constantly apparent with an abundance of dancing cowgirls and cowboys taking over the center stage at will. Vivid Technicolor photography does justice to the vivid Arizona desert scenery, and just about the only problem that confronted the producers was how to get Dorothy Lamour into revealing costumes inasmuch as the background was them thar wide open spaces. A solution was reached by making Dotty's character an ex-burlesque queen who has her own wardrobe befitting such numbers as "I'm the Secretary to the Sultan" and "Indian Gal Heap Hep." That took care of everything.

The comedy is breezy and funny enough to please lots of audiences.

Dick Powell plays the mining engineer whose troubles fade away when a counterfeiter lends him a fortune in phony banknotes to flash at his creditors. Victor Moore is mighty amusing as the counterfeiter, and Cass Daley and Gil Lamb are in comically to pep things up.

THE CITY THAT STOPPED HITLER (Paramount) is a powerful Russian documentary which is also known by the shorter title, "Heroic Stalingrad." It is a comprehensive blow-by-blow depiction of what happened when a magnificent counter-attack exploded right in Der Fuehrer's face. The city of Stalingrad had withstood three months of constant bombardment which reduced buildings to rubble. The Nazis had counted out the defenders and had informed the rest of the world that the fall of Stalingrad was merely a matter of hours. Then the Russians struck out with an unprecedented offensive, sending spearheads to encircle their besiegers and drive them back from the shores of the Volga and across the Don. That was just the beginning. Tens of thousands Axis prisoners were taken. Many more thousands were killed, and the picture spares no one's feelings in showing the dead.

IN BRIEF REVIEW

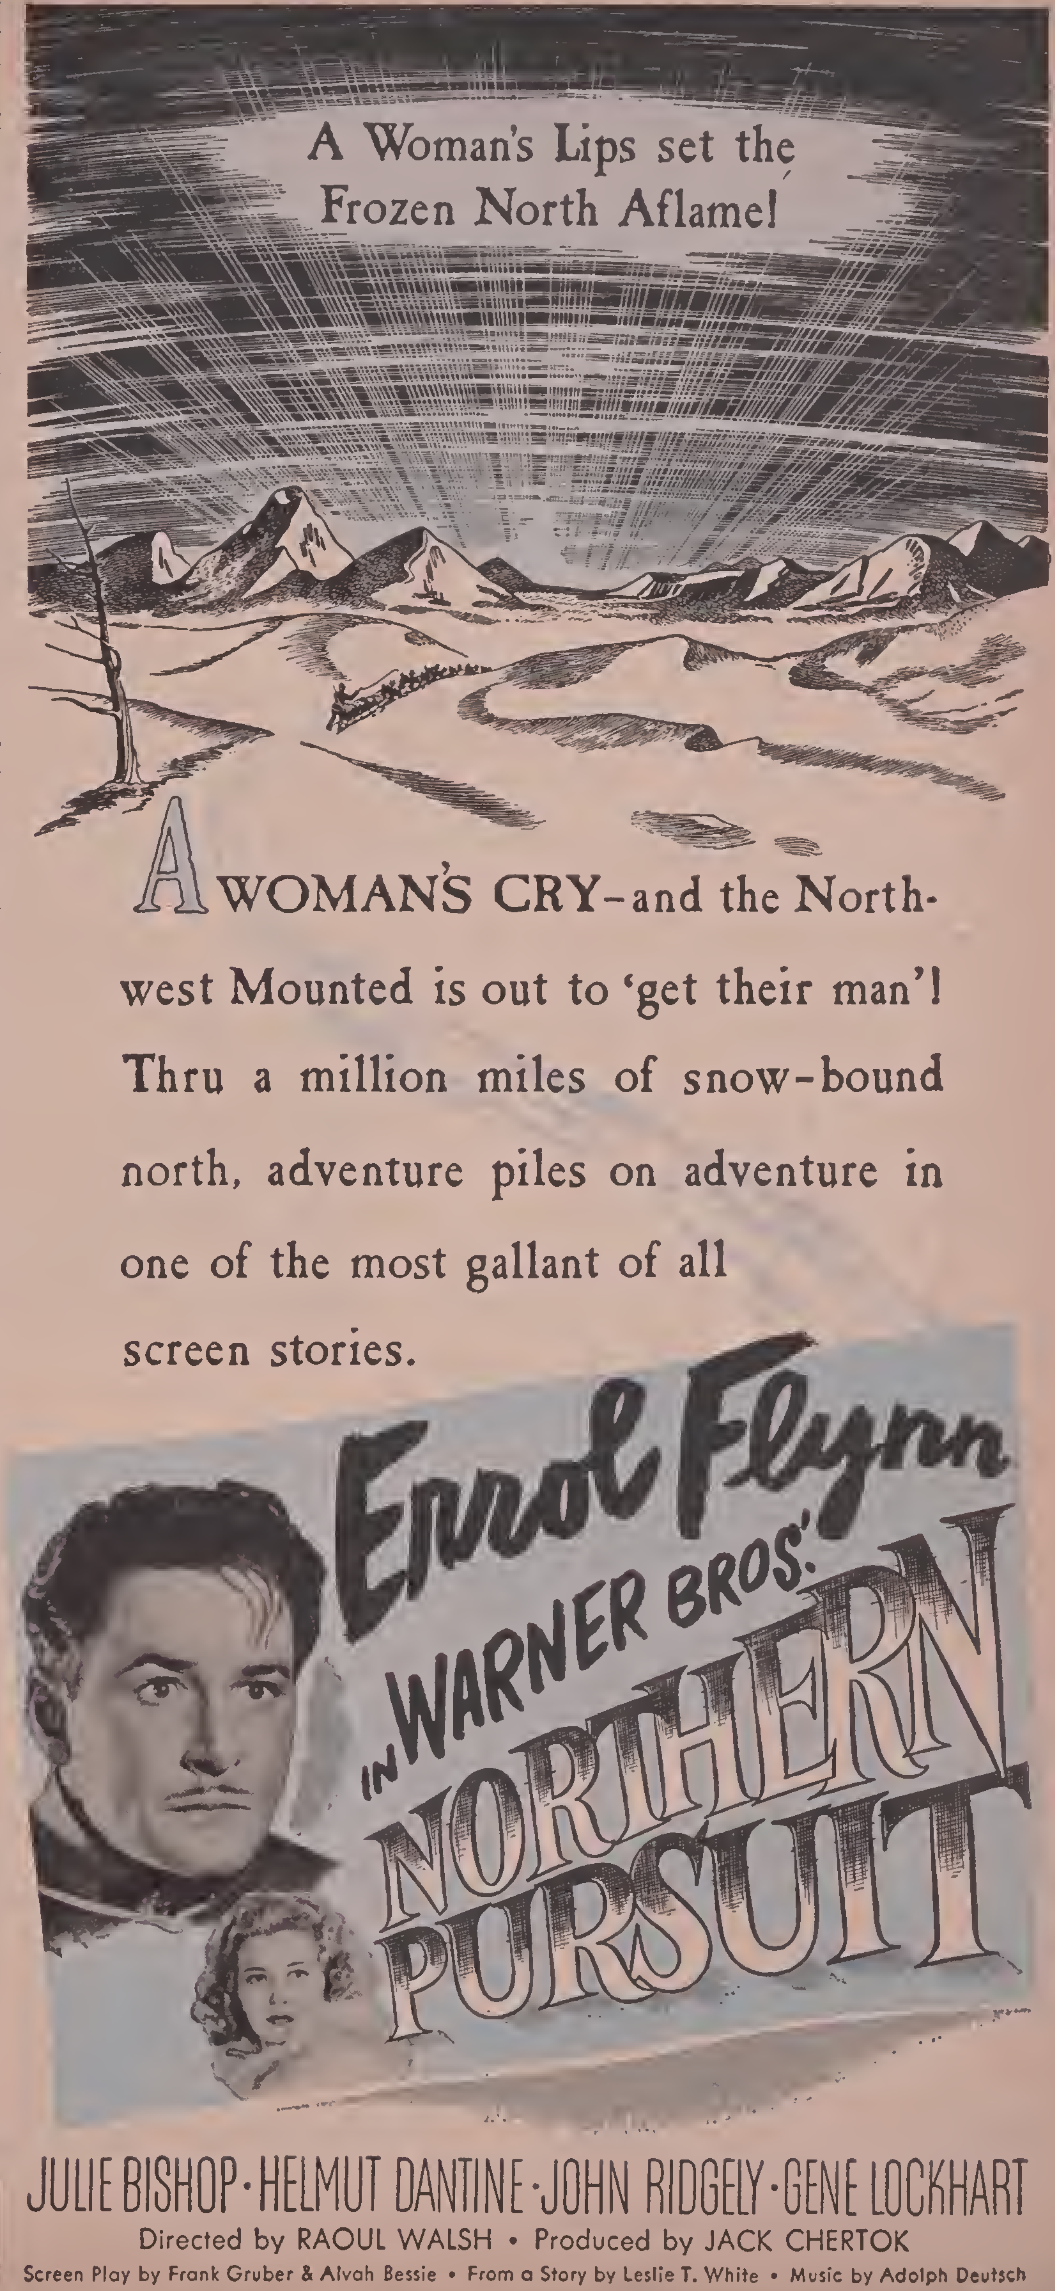
WINTERTIME (20th Century-Fox) is a disappointment, except for the skating by Sonja Henie. A trite and silly script sends such comics as Jack Oakie, Cesar Romero, and S. Z. Sakall around bumping into each other searching for laughs that aren't to be found. It's all about trying to make a success of a Canadian winter resort, but you never care. Cornel Wilde plays a romantic lead as though frost-bitten, and Woody Herman's orchestra has a chilly time trying to provide hot-licks. Then Sonja skates and partly redeems her latest vehicle.

TOP MAN (Universal) is the irresponsible Donald O'Connor with a war message for other 'teen agers too young to get into the fight. He leads his junior-college classmates in descending upon an airplane factory to take jobs on the short four-hour shifts. Of course, there is a show put on for the war-workers, and this entertainment features the classical voice of Susanna Foster and the jive of Donald, Peggy Ryan, and Count Basie's orchestra. Lillian Gish and Richard Dix as the parents of Donald are fairly well lost in the proceedings.

SO THIS IS WASHINGTON (RKO-Radio) is the happiest screen appearance of the radio team of Lum and Abner. If you are amused by the rural horseplay of these Pine Ridge veterans, there are a number of laughs in the experiences of the pair when they take Abner's formula for synthetic rubber to the nation's capital.

THE STRANGE DEATH OF ADOLF HITLER (Universal) is really about the murder of his double. It has long been an intriguing notion that Hitler has a whole staff of impersonators who appear for him at public functions as protection against assassination. Yet the picture about the subject merely scratches the surface of what might have been a first-class thriller, and Ludwig Donath in the role of Hitler is the only performance worth noting.

ADVENTURE IN IRAQ (Warner Bros.) is our venerable friend "The Green Goddess" dressed up in modern clothes. The Raja which George Arliss delighted to play is now a sheik who is performed by Paul Cavanagh and the rescue of the young couple he holds captive is effected by a detachment of U.S. Army bombers, no less. Don't go out of your way to catch "Adventure in Iraq." It's B melodrama.



A Woman's Lips set the Frozen North Aflame!

WORDS of MUSIC

By JILL WARREN

THE TUNEFILMS:

Warner Brothers don't make many musicals, but when they do, they're good ones like "This Is The Army." Their newest attempt should top the lot. It's "Rhapsody in Blue," the story of George Gershwin's life and music.

Most of the members of the cast were closely associated with Gershwin at one time or another during his brilliant career. You'll see Paul Whiteman, Oscar Levant, George White, and Al Jolson, all playing themselves. Jolson will sing "Swanee" just as he did at the New York Winter Garden way back in 1919, and Paul Whiteman and his orchestra will reenact their Aeolian Hall Concert of 1924 in which they introduced the immortal "Rhapsody in Blue." Robert Alda, who will play the role of Gershwin, has been studying piano for months in preparation for the part. . . .

In Universal's new Donald O'Connor picture, "This Is The Life," we find our old friend Ray Eberle, singing "All Or Nothing At All." Ray appears set for a Universal build-up, if his recent camera activities are any indication. He's also in "Honeymoon Lodge" and "Hi Ya Sailor."

The Andrews Sisters' film, "Moonlight and Cactus," brings Mitchell Ayres and his band to the screen for the first time. This outfit has come up very fast in popularity the last year. . . .

Hal McIntyre and his band make their initial visit to Hollywood for a featured spot in Columbia Pictures' "Jam Session." The last time Hal was on a movie set, he was a saxophonist with the old Glenn Miller band . . .

Jimmy Dorsey and his orchestra were signed by Twentieth Century-Fox to handle the rhythm chores in their new musical, "Camp Show." This is the new title for "Four Jills and a Jeep"—the story of the Martha Raye-Carole Landis-Kay Francis-Mitzi Mayfair overseas tour. Perry Como is on the same lot, and he draws a lead, no less, in "The Bowery After Dark." This picture is a remake of Twentieth's early hit, "The Bowery." Perry will play the old George Raft role, with a few songs added. They say he made a wonderful test, and that he photographs excellently, so maybe he will be deserting radio and nightclubs for movies exclusively . . .

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

The Victor Company has only one new release, but it looks like a winner. It's a dance arrangement of "Rhapsody In Blue" by the Glenn Miller band, recorded a couple of years ago. . . .

Columbia's contribution this month is Xavier Cugat's "Bim Bam Bum," a guaracha, with Tito Rodriguez on the vocal, backed up by "Thanks For The Dream," a beguine, sung by Carmen Castillo and the Cugat Chorus. . . .

Decca has brought out an Andrews Sisters platter which was recorded a few years back but never released—"I Love You Much Too Much" and "Helena," both arranged by Vic Shoen. And then there are two new ones by Bing Crosby, with vocal backgrounds, "People Will Say We're In Love" and "Oh, What A Beautiful Morning." Frank Sinatra did the same tunes for Columbia, so it will be most interesting to see which record sells the most copies.

The Sportsmen, one of the top radio quartets, have made their first recording under the Decca Label—it's that swingy thingy "KO-TOK-Y-I-O" written by Capt. Meredith Wilson. . . .

The Mills Brothers' pressing of "Paper Doll" turned out to be one of the biggest hits on the jukeboxes and helped to regain some of the popularity the boys have lost the last two or three years. . . .

Capitol comes forth with a really solid disc in "All For You" and "Vom Vim Veedle" as done by the King Cole Trio. Oscar Moore is on guitar, Red Callendar on bass, and of course Cole on piano.

"Moon Dreams" is a beautiful thing, a new Johnny Mercer tune sung by Martha Tilton and the Mellowaires. Incidentally, this company puts out a fine little paper every two weeks called "The Capitol." It's chuck full of record and music news. Movieland readers may be put on the mailing list by sending a card to Dave Dexter, Jr., 1483 North Vine Street, Hollywood 28, California. Just you be sure to mention that you read about it in "Words of Music" or I'll yell.

EARMARKS OF HITS:

Perry Botkin, Bing Crosby's guitarist, has written a song about a cowboy who turns pilot, titled "Ridin' Herd On A Cloud," and it seems destined for a big success. . . .

Patti Andrews is introducing a cute ditty in "Moonlight and Cactus"—"C'mere Baby." And it's the first time Patti has sung a solo in a picture. . . .

Listen for a lovely ballad called "For The First Time." Frank Sinatra and Dick Haymes have both been singing it, so I don't see how it can miss the Hit Parade. . . .

Dinah Shore sings three new Harold Arlen songs in the Goldwyn musical "Up In Arms" that you'll be hearing a lot of—"Now I Know," "Tess' Torch Song," and "Jive." . . . The war songs keep coming. "Johnny's Coming Home Tonight" and "You'd Better Give Me Lots of Lovin', Honey" are two of the best. . . .

The Treasury Department commissioned Frank Loesser to write a song for their new bond drive, and the result is "The Road To Victory," a hit if there ever was one. . . .

JUNE-MOON TWOSOMES:

When Gene Krupa was in Hollywood for a week before his new trial in San Francisco, he spent most of the time with his divorced wife, Ethel. Everyone is hoping there will be a reconciliation. . . . Before Corporal Dave Rose left for the East to handle the music for the new Moss Hart Air Force show, he was seen about Hollywood with Helen Forrest. Helen denies she is leaving the Harry James band to go out on her own, but I wouldn't be surprised if she did. . . . Paul Weston, who had the band on Johnny Mercer's Music Shop program, and Shirley Mitchell, well-known radio actress, are always together. Paul was Tommy Dorsey's arranger for several years and also did many of Dinah Shore's songs before going into radio with his own band. . . .

ON THE BEAM:

More and more radio shows have

Rita Hayworth BECOMES

BY DEE OFSTIE

Volunteered the lady license clerk—for a couple with a previous marriage apiece to their credit, Rita and Orson were the most nervous she had seen.

Mrs. ORSON WELLES

THE romantic bombshell of the year was the Rita Hayworth-Orson Welles marriage—and their surprised public may be delighted to know that the most surprised parties to the whole affair, once the hasty "I do's" were said and they stood folded in each other's arms, seemed to be Rita and Orson themselves!

As far as even their closest friends know, this electric event in the lives of Hollywood's two most fascinating figures was actually planned and carried out in a single day. The wedding itself—complete from the purchasing of the license to the flashlight photo of Mr. and Mrs. Welles being congratulated by marrying official, Judge Orlando H. Rhodes—took exactly thirty-two minutes.

Subtract the long minutes lost in waiting for the elevators of the Bay City Building of Santa Monica to take the wedding party up and down between the twelfth floor License Bureau to the fourth floor offices where the ceremony was performed, and you have the fastest welding on record.

For all its hectic haste, the ceremony, to the assorted few of us who witnessed it, was the inevitable and happy culmination of a romance that started merely as the natural drawing together of two highly magnetized personalities, and in no time at all, exploded into love. The irresistible Hayworth and the immovable Welles (Continued on page 74)

A colorful ceremony it was—not only because of the personalities involved, but consider Rita's "burnt toast" suit and hat and Orson's black bow tie atop a "shocking" pink shirt.

Joe Cotten was supposed to be Orson's best man, but the photographers and reporters crowded the scene so much that Joe "stood up" with a newspaper man all during the ceremony. He got next the groom afterwords.

The new Mr. and Mrs. didn't put anything over on Orson's foster parent and guardian, Dr. Maurice Bernstein. He said he wasn't the least bit surprised—he knew it all the time.

The Miraculous

DEDICATED TO ALL THE MOTHERS

BY CONSTANCE PALMER

The faces on these fellows at Sydney will give you an idea of the reception Joe received on his trips. (Photo by U. S. Army Signal Corps.)

JOE E. BROWN limped slowly down the length of the hospital hut, somewhere in the South Pacific. Outside a quick, violent storm whipped the palm trees and tore at the low thatched roof. Rain beat in dismal sheets against the bamboo blinds at the windows, and little rivers of water trickled and murmured sadly away into the night.

Now and then Joe stopped and spoke to some boy who was awake. Everywhere the answer was the same.

"Gee, I'm all right! Got to get well fast so I can get back at those yellow ———!"

He went on, clowning a little, quietly, and the ones who could laugh did laugh and . . . of the others . . . eyes smiled out of faces too bandaged to grin.

Two nurses and a doctor were bending over a bed in the corner. The boy was terribly burned. Tears were running down his face; he'd lost his nerve.

Joe leaned down.

"Buck up, fella . . . you'll be all right!"

The boy's brimming eyes focused painfully. His blackened lips opened.

"I know you," he whispered. "I had an ice cream soda with you once."

Joe moved closer, trying to find a resemblance to anyone he knew.

"Why, sure you did!" he said. Recognition flashed over him. ". . . And as I recall, you settled for two!"

The pain-creases smoothed from the boy's forehead, and he almost smiled. The light in his eyes revealed what it means to him to be known as something more than one in a throng. Joe laid his hand gently on the bed.

"Keep your chin up, Johnny. Everything's going to be okey-doke!"

Blinking back stinging tears, he limped away and went to the next bed. The boy was John Walker; he'd lived in Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, and had been a friend of Joe L. Brown, Joe E.'s son, who had been going to school there. Our Joe had taken both the boys on an ice cream bender long, long ago before the world caught on fire and exploded, once, months ago, when Don Brown had been alive, too.

Joe Brown is a fatalist; he believes what is meant to be. will be.

Healing of JOE E. BROWN

AND FATHERS WHO HAVE LOST THEIR BOYS IN BATTLE

He had gone on his trips to entertain the boys—first to Alaska and the Aleutians and then to the Solomon Islands and Australia—convinced that when his number was up, it would be his turn. If not, he would come home safe to do what good he could here for the boys who are still out there.

The only difference was that the second trip—the one to the Solomons—he and his wife Katheryn dedicated to their son, Don, who died in an airplane crash when he was training in California. Joe still can't talk much about Don, but in the living room of his home in Brentwood there is a glass case with the simple placard, "Captain Brown," and in it are the Bible and insignia that belonged to his son.

I dedicated the trip to Don," he says quietly, "because he was slated to go out there in just ten days. I thought perhaps I could help a bit that way."

The Joe E. Brown who said this was a very different Joe from the one you see on the screen. The small eyes with the twinkle when he's clowning had an inspired light in them as they looked at the glass case across the room.

"A person finds out a lot of things about himself in a shock like that," he went on. "In one moment his life is changed. A mother's life is changed, too. Today's parents, thousands of them, alas, must get such news . . . get it, take it, and see what they're going to do about it. And then slowly, in the days and weeks that come after, there's readjustment and a clearing up of values."

Joe doesn't go to any one church; he goes to all of them. He finds something in every religion—Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, Christian Scientist—that helps him. He has a sublime faith in the Supreme Being. Yet he never expected this faith to be paid off to him as it was.

"I don't believe in preachers reading prayers out of books when they don't actually feel deep in themselves what they are saying," he says. "Lots of people just go to church to be seen and get credit from other people for going. Lots of them go there to sleep.

"You can worship God in a green field or a factory or in your own kitchen, doing things of service to others, as well as you can in a church.

"I believe there's too much mystery about religion, just like there is about sex. There shouldn't be any mystery about either one. I believe that God is love and without love you haven't anything."

When Joe went on the trip to the Solomons, he was a sick man, suffering mentally, suffering physically the excruciating pain from sciatica. Arthritis had so crippled him that one leg was definitely shorter than the other, and he hadn't walked without a cane for more than two years. The plane taking him to Hawaii had engine trouble after leaving San Francisco and came back for repairs, and Joe, in agony with the aching leg, waited until the repairs were made . . . and then climbed back in for the second take-off.

The plane cruised along at seventeen-thousand feet, and it was bitterly cold. He wasn't dressed warmly enough, there were no blankets, and by the time they got to Oahu in the Hawaiian Islands, he was so ill he had to be carried to the hospital.

Days he spent entertaining the boys on Oahu and other islands in the group, and nights in any hospital he could find.

"I took every kind of heat treatment they'd give me and stayed right in there batting, with two strikes on me every time I went up to the plate. Johnny Marvin, my guitar player, and Lieutenant Virgil, who were sort of liaison men sent along to take care of me, were worrying around like a couple of upset old hens."

Though Washington and the U.S.O. had made it possible for him to get to the Hawaiian Islands, once he was there he was stranded. Officially, there was no place else for him to go.

He started sending messages where they would do the most good. From long experience, he knew that when you want something done, you go to the top men. So he radioed direct to General MacArthur and Admiral Halsey.

Things started to move right away. A plane was put at his disposal. A route, where no civilian had ever gone before in wartime, was mapped out, and he was off.

"We landed at Rabaul just as it was getting dark. It had been a long hop, and we were all pretty tired. A little group of boys was waiting. They'd heard I was coming and wanted me to put on a show then and there. So I climbed up on a little knoll, three feet high, and started in.

"The sun sank . . . bang! the way it does in the tropics, and it was dark. I thought I'd better stop because they couldn't see me. But they yelled out, "Aw, go on, Joe! Don't stop! (Continued on page 85)

BEST GOOD DEED of the MONTH

SOMETIMES when a man is brought face to face with a crime or a disease, he determines to "do something about it," but it takes a strong man to carry out that determination when he is out of personal danger. Hollywood has two men like that—Lou Costello and Bud Abbott.

When Lou was convalescing from his long illness, he and Bud made plans for a Rheumatic Fever Foundation to be established at Palm Springs, California. They filed papers for a non-profit corporation. They bought, out of their own pockets, twenty-two acres of Palm Springs real estate. And now Hollywood is seeing steps being taken for the creation of this twenty million dollar humanitarian project.

Where is all the money coming from? Well, consider that each of Abbott and Costello's ten films, not including "Hit the Ice," has grossed ten million dollars. And then imagine how much these two comedians will pick up when they re-issue "Buck Privates" (as an initial star fund raiser) and tour the country with it, turning over their entire stage salaries and the percentage they receive from the profits over to the Foundation.

The Most Exciting Adventure Yarn Ever Written About Any Star

THE COURAGE OF Katina Paxinou

BY TERENCE KENNEDY

IT was in London in the early summer of 1939 that a friend invited me to attend a performance at "His Majesty's Theater." I gladly accepted. When later I learned that the performance in question was to be the "Electra" of Sophocles to be given in Greek by a group of players from the Royal Theater in Athens, I was much less happy, but I couldn't decline at the last minute.

At the theater, to my astonishment, I found all the well known London first-nighters looking fashionably bored. "Who are these players from the Balkans who have attracted an audience that would do credit to a Cochran first night?" I asked.

My friend shrugged his shoulders. "It's semi-official—arranged by our Embassy in Athens—we couldn't do otherwise when we learned that the German Minister of Beaux Arts had invited them to perform in Germany. But there's no intermission and we should be out by ten-thirty."

I glanced at the program in my hand. On the cover was a picture of the leading lady of the troupe as she appeared as "Electra." The first thing that struck me were her exquisite hands. The face was pictured in profile, bowed in grief. It was a beautiful profile such as one finds only on a Grecian mural.

I looked for the actress' name and saw that it was Madame Katina Paxinou. Just then she audience rose as their Royal Highnesses, the Duke and Duchess of Kent, stepped into their stall. The Duchess, a former Greek Princess, looked nervous. I appreciated how she must have felt—Londoners are cold at best, and that night they were going to sit through two hours of Sophocles in a language which was definitely Greek to them. The Duchess must have said a silent prayer as the lights slowly dimmed and Orestes made his appearance on the stage.

My friend and I settled back in our chairs as comfortably as we could, and like the rest of the audience listened politely while Orestes and his old teacher went through their long speeches which precede Electra's entrance. Suddenly as they left the stage, a voice rose from the distance. There was an uncanny stillness in the theater while the audience waited to hear the voice again. It had an unearthly quality. Seated on the edge of our chairs, we watched the mourning-clad Electra advance slowly toward us. She didn't seem to walk like a human being but rather moved like a panther; taking long flexible steps, her eyes fixed on the audience. She was tall and slender, and the pallor of her face was accentuated by her coal black hair.

By the time the play had ended, there was no doubt about it. This was no ordinary actress. As the final curtain fell, I saw in an English theater what I never believed possible. The entire audience rose, and the shouts of "Bravo" were so ear-splitting that my head ached. Time after time they called her back until I lost count of the curtain calls. I left the next day for Paris, but, curious to see what the critics would have to say about Madame Paxinou, I bought all the English newspapers. They were unanimous in their praise of her, and one wrote, "Beside most actresses Madame Katina Paxinou resembles the Parthenon set in a block of service flats."

Then war was declared, and back in London after the fall of France, as the bombings grew in intensity, I forgot all about theatres, performers and such. After being bombed out of my house, I moved to the Ritz Hotel. It was in the shelter of that hotel that I first met the extraordinary Katina.

Like the Londoners, I had by that time become more or less accustomed to the bombings. As usual on this particular night I had undressed and gone to bed. But this night sleep was impossible. The bombs were dropping closer and closer, and as one burst into Piccadilly only a few hundred yards away, I hastened for the bar which was located in the cellar and also served as a shelter. They were bringing in some casualties. One man had all his clothes blown off but seemed otherwise unharmed. When I reached the stairs leading into the shelter, I saw two women dressed in bathrobes, trying to help a man descend the stairs. He was covered with blood.

"Can I help?" I asked.

"No," the one woman answered putting her arms around the wounded man's waist. "I can manage alone." Whereupon she practically carried the man down the passage-way.

I was seated at one of the tables in the bar when she came back. She sat across from me and began to knit. She appeared to be completely lost in what she was doing. "Those hands!" I exclaimed half aloud. "Where have I seen those hands?"

The woman next to me looked as though I had gone mad. "What did you say?"

"Who is that woman?" I asked more calmly.

"Why that's Paxinou," she answered as though I should have known.

Needless to say, I didn't ask to be introduced. Under the circumstances with death lurking in the skies outside, formalities were ridiculous. The setting itself was ridiculous and melodramatic. All around me were international personalities—Prince Ludfallah of Egypt, Starhemburg of Austria, the Princess Radziwill, refugee Ministers and Ambassadors lying pell mell all over the floor, while in the ladies' lavatory slept a Queen—Geraldine of Albania. Picking my way over the reclining figures, I approached Paxinou's table.

"What's the matter," she smiled. "Can't you sleep?" I shook my head.

"Would you like some coffee?" she whispered.

"I'd love some," I answered. "But where will we get it?"

"In the kitchen, of course. Come, I know where they keep the eggs, too."

Robbing the ice box of the Ritz Hotel at three o'clock in the morning with "Electra" was more exciting than the blitz. With the efficiency of a chef she prepared a breakfast of scrambled eggs, toast, and coffee, after which she drew from the large bag in which she kept her knitting the prize of prizes—a package of American cigarettes.

"No! No!" she cried as I reached for the packet. "First we eat, then we can start on the cigarettes."

Never has coffee tasted so good! And the American cigarettes! We were smoking the last one when the siren went off at six o'clock announcing the all clear.

"We'd better go now," she said with her dark eyes flashing. "It would spoil everything if we were caught. Tomorrow night we'll make (Continued on page 71)

LET'S CALL ON The McDowalls

Roddy was three years old when he acted out little scenes around his doll house.

At the age of ten months, Roddy, in the backyard of his London home, showed an aptitude for romping in front of a camera.

Today at the McDowalls' you will find this group. They are Mother McDowall, sister Virginia, and Roddy.

WHEN you call on the McDowalls, it's a toss-up who'll answer the door. It may be Roddy himself, or Mother McDowall, or Roddy's pretty blonde sister, Virginia.

If it's Roddy, he'll be in dungarees and an old shirt, having dashed away from running the carpet sweeper over the dining room floor to surprise Mommy when she gets back from a shopping expedition. If it's Mrs. McDowall, she'll beam a welcome, grinning apologetically as she dries her hands on her apron. "Kitchen's no place for a hot day! But still and all, a chicken won't fry itself, now will it?" If it's Virginia, she'll be cool as a spring day, smiling with just a touch of the dignity and poise with which sweet-sixteen reminds you that she's "quite a young lady" these days.

Two pals who started a friendship in MGM's "Lassie Come Home" are Roddy McDowall and Lassie, the beautiful collie dog above.

Once inside, you'll shake your head with surprise. Is this the living room of the child movie star of "Lassie Come Home" and "My Friend Flicka," of "How Green Was My Valley," or an internationally famous prodigy?

It could easily be your Aunt Mathilda's front room in Springfield or Portland or Atlanta . . . or just about anywhere in an average comfortable home in the United States. It's a room for living in, all right. Lots of comfy chairs, a sturdy upright piano, a great radio-victrola, books, and family pictures, flowers and candy dishes scattered everywhere you look. If it takes "a heap o' livin' in a house to make it home," then Roddy McDowall's is a super home. The McDowalls are up early and to bed late, with enough energy for a family of twelve!

Roddy's intense personality leaves its mark on every part of the house. Trying to confine him to his own room would be like trying to cage a comet. He's taken over the buffet drawers in the dining room for his vast, carefully indexed collection of picture postcards of every American city he's ever visited. In the downstairs hall, the drawers of a vast cupboard are crammed full of his "stuff." Important "stuff" to Roddy, who confesses he's been piling things in there ever since they moved in. When he hunts for something there, he's constantly turning up surprises he'd forgotten about—old programs, old notebooks, maps, a handful of seashells, boxing gloves ("Now where on earth did I get those?") and whatnot. Sometimes he's so side-tracked by this treasure trove, he forgets, almost, what it was he started to unearth.

The McDowalls

A man of hobbies is Roddy, and stamp collecting is one of those hobbies. He's pretty shrewd about it.

Another Roddy McDowall hobby is that typically American one of collecting match covers from all over.

If anyone wants to see Roddy's "office" he has to climb through the tangle of things stored in the broom closet, where the slant of the stairs to the second floor roofs in all the files, boxes, and hundreds of letters not sorted out yet. Roddy's a shrewd collector, and he's made "deals" with the fan mail department of various studios to shoot him stamped envelopes from countries in which he's specially interested. Despite an eagle eye and a sharp ear to the ground, Roddy still hasn't been able to get hold of the one stamp he wants most—"a South African three corner, 1926."

But it isn't just stamps Roddy collects. He collects coins, reproductions of his favorite paintings, maps, match covers, programs, army insignia. Recently, when he came back from a whirlwind combination camp show and personal appearance tour, he had somehow managed to acquire an entire week-end bag full of new match covers.

Roddy's first floor room, more than any part of the McDowall home, fairly shouts of the one absent member, Roddy's father, who is with the British Merchant Marine. The room's as seagoing as it's possible to be on land. The wallpaper, deep ocean blue and foam-white, is figured with a pattern of ships and pilot

Roddy and big sister Virginia play jokes on one another in true brother-sister form, and they love to tell about them afterwards as you will read in this story.

Roddy was only eleven when this picture was taken, but he still keeps tabs on his imaginary land of "Fidelis."

wheels. All the lamp bases are coppery miniatures of a ship's bell or anchor or other nautical gear. Close by the bed are snapshots of Daddy McDowall aboard ship. Those two pictures hold the place of honor above any Academy Awards or other souvenirs, however highly prized.

In this house of laughter and vitality, the only subdued note is when Daddy is mentioned. Then Roddy's sparkle, Mrs. McDowall's warmth and effervescence, Virginia's sweetly gentle smile, all are softened, for the moment, and in their eyes comes the same far look blended of fierce pride and love and longing for the wonderful, heart-lifting day when Dad'll be home once more.

"He was at sea as a young man, you know," Mrs. McDowall explains. "Then after we married, he began a trucking business, which he turned over to the government when the war began. He had to be back where he knew he could best do his part. It's hard when the letters we write keep missing him—but only yesterday a cablegram came to say he's safe, right now, in England."

Having left England to escape the bombings and earn enough to keep their home going, the McDowalls know their moments of loneliness even to this day.

In Roddy's room is the mixed-up jumble you'd expect of any fourteen-year-old. Fourteen on September the 17th, by the way. "Say it emphatically," his mother interpolates, "for we get so many letters guessing his age all wrong. He's fourteen, and his sister's sixteen and that's that." Books line the walls—histories, biographies, scores of them, and the stories of his pictures, like Twentieth Century-Fox's "How Green Is My Valley" and "My Friend Flicka," autographed by the authors and members of the casts.

Roddy's got a big war map on one wall, full of colored pins to move as the news changes. Recently, though, while he was hard at work in "White Cliffs of Dover" with Irene Dunne and Spencer Tracy, as he points out, a bit mournfully, "the war got 'way ahead of me." On his bureau is a photo of Ginger Rogers, to which he hopes to add those of his crushes, Carol Bruce and Helen Hayes.

Back in early grammar school days in England this was a familiar trio—Roddy and Virginia with their dad, Thomas Andrew McDowall.

After graduation from the Hanover Academy of Dramatic Arts, he launched his picture career.

Off for a set of tennis. Roddy was eleven then and just newly arrived in Hollywood.

Father and son don't see very much of one another now that Dad wears a British uniform.

The Things for Which 9 Stars Give Thanks This Year

Loretta Young gives thanks for all the blessings she never knew she had before.

WHAT is there to be thankful for in this year of war?

"I'm thankful this year," says Loretta Young, "for all the blessings I never knew I had before—that I'm an American, that I have work and health. My thanksgiving is for the things I've always taken for granted other years. Shelter safe from bombs, enough food to eat, warm clothes to wear, being able to move about without terror, being allowed to read what I choose, hear radio programs I select, say what I please without looking to see whether anyone's listening."

A letter closely written, worn with much handling, smudged with kisses and tears, is Michele Morgan's reason for thanksgiving.

"I had not heard from my family in France for more than a year and a half," she relates. "I used to pray every night that they might be safe, that they might be alive and well. Every time I read an item about Frenchmen being sent to prison in German labor camps I thought of my young brother and wondered whether he were in one. I heard of the fear and hunger in France and worried over my mother.

"Then at last came this letter, smuggled out through Switzerland and not censored. They say that our old home is now 'occupied,' which must mean that the Germans have taken it over, and that they live now in a small apartment in Paris; that (Continued on page 70)

This is Myself

BY JUDY GARLAND

(The Girl on Movieland's Cover)

I USED TO:

Work in small time vaudeville theatres.

Be called the leather lunker blues singer, I'm ashamed to say; the little girl with the big voice.

Dream that I was singing with a symphony orchestra—I felt as if I were still dreaming when at last it came true and I stood up to sing with Andre Kostelanetz.

I REMEMBER:

Getting in the way of a forward-passed cheese sandwich one night when I was singing in a small time vaudeville house and how furious I was; all I could say, over and over, was "Some day!"

My Christmas dinner when I was ten. I was singing at Warners' Hollywood theatre and couldn't have dinner at home. Mother promised she'd let me choose where I would eat and what I'd have. I went to a drugstore and ordered hot tamales.

The white party dress I wore to the Academy dinner when I won my Oscar.

Wearing that dress again when I was footprinted at Grauman's Chinese Theatre, and how Mickey Rooney held it up out of the cement for me.

MY FIRST:

Appearances were made in our backyard shows where my sisters and I charged ten straight pins a show.

Poem was composed when I was four and heard my sisters making up verse. I went in for rhythm not rhyme and the result was: Bookie, Bookie, I saw a star
Money, money, salt, salt, salt . . .

Car was a Lincoln Zephyr Convertible, a present on my sixteenth birthday, and I loved it, but I wasn't big enough to see what was behind me when I backed up, so after four months I was persuaded to give it up.

Friend was Betty Jane Graham, who is still my closest girl friend. We were four years old and met when we tried out for a part at Universal Studios. Betty Jane thought I would get the part, and I thought she would, so we brushed each other off. But when Cora Sue Collins got it, we fell into each other's arms.

I LIKE:

Bonfires on the beach . . . Baby chicks . . . Walking in the rain . . . Anything chocolate . . . Men who know how to handle head waiters . . . Christmas Eve.

I DISLIKE:

Dull pencils . . . That put-on Southern accent . . . Salted peanuts . . . Getting telephone connections . . . Attending to details . . . Mayonnaise . . . Popcorn.

I'M GUILTY OF:

Losing my keys . . . eating too many chocolates . . . forgetting appointments or being late . . . I've never worn a watch because I'd rather not know what time it is . . . And I'm the worst backseat driver in the world.

I HATE TO:

Have my nails filed . . . Go home when the party's getting good . . . Wait for people who said they'd positively be on time . . . Hear a baby cry and nobody do anything about it . . . Grow lovely long fingernails and then have one break off . . . Get up early.

I LOVE TO:

Cook, but I hate to clean up afterwards . . . Make over hats and remodel clothes . . . Play tennis, Guggenheim, Ghost . . . Keep the radio going or records playing whenever I'm in the house . . . Spoil my sister's baby—but I never do!

I'VE LEARNED:

From my mother—Practically all I know, including singing, playing the piano, cooking, and managing a house.

From my sisters—How to get along with other girls, not to acquire a star-complex.

From Mickey Rooney—Anything I know about screen technique. The first day we worked together on a picture he said, "Let's promise each other never to work at each other but always with each other!" and we always have. He's given me plenty of good advice, including, "Don't worry!" But I'm still the world's champion worrier.

Glamour ...INSTANTLY!

1. You start with a pretty little thing like Donna Reed, all done up in her neat blue skirt, her tidy white blouse. Nice? Oh, very. Glamorous? Well, you'd hardly say that.

2. But now look. In comes that close-fitting satin gown. Cut the neck line orfully, orfully low. Emphasize the bust line. Put flowers in the hair. Get that heavy-lidded look. Zowie!

3. Next bring on the white bear rug and a black chiffon nightie. Diana Lewis illustrates. (At the right you see Diana as Mrs. William Powell, chic matron.)

Got a fellow coming home on a furlough? Do you want to put on the really high voltage? Follow the Hollywood routine illustrated here.

4. A glamour girl's wardrabe must include one close-fitting white satin negligee, taa, and as Warners' Dolores Moran shows, she pases with hair combed out an pillaw.

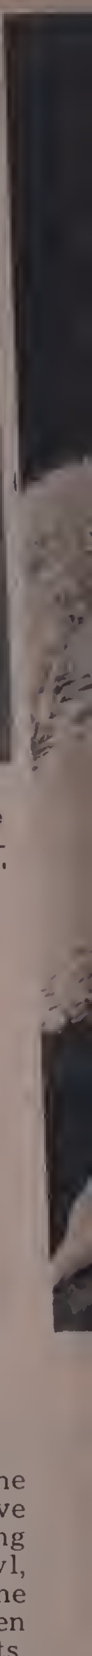
5. Iwo bearskins this time. And a black satin form revealer. The girl is Marilyn Maxwell of MGM, and she was a singer with Buddy Rogers' ond Ted Weems' bands not very lang ago

6. Then alluring Osa Massen (of the Warner Bros. "Background to Danger"): the plain white negligee, the heavy-lidded laak, the white bearskin rug, and Oso goes ane more with l-e-g-s.

7. Trust Maria the Mantez ta get it oll. The legs, the look, the negligee, the bearskin rug, ond also the feothers, a must.

Yes, it's Wallace Beery as he looked at about the time he started his phenomenal career in pictures, which was, by actual count, thirty-seven years ago.

Now that Carol Ann Beery has decided to follow Papa's footsteps in the movies, Wally teaches her some of his make-up tricks. And says he, confidently, "We're going to be the outstanding screen team in Hollywood!"



HALF A BILLION BEERY

BY LUPTON A. WILKINSON

Wally has earned more money than any creative artist since the world began. And here are the reasons why

WALLACE BEERY, ex-steelworker, ex-engine wiper, ex-choir boy, ex-elephant tender, ex-chorus man and ex-Broadway star, may be going to marry again.

If Wally were just "ex," Hollywood wouldn't be so interested in the strong probability of new wedding bells for the man who was previously married to Gloria Swanson and Rita Gilman.

But this man, W. Beery, is never "ex."

Things he IS include Lieutenant Commander, U. S. N.R., a rank earned by seven thousand solo hours in the air; dean of film stars, in length of service and regularity of success; the world's highest paid actor (a recent raise made him that); devoted father to lovely thirteen-year-old Carole Ann, whom he adopted at nine months old; man-to-man friend to real cowboys in Wyoming, Utah, and Idaho and, last, a man who, by his own sincere life and the character of roles he portrays, has always been a credit to Hollywood.

The girl in the case is Aurella Nawrocki, of Houston, Texas, whose chestnut hair and blue eyes highlight a face both pretty and with a quality of sincerity. She is in her twenties, employed in the treasurer's office of a Houston hospital, and is sister to the wife of one of Wally's best friends, a former Texas oil man now living in Hollywood. Since Wally met her when she came for an extended visit to her sister, the two have been seen much together. To all questions, pending the final decision, Wally's answer has been a growl, "Try and find out!" However, close friends became sure of his serious regard for the Texas beauty when the two began to take Carole Ann with them on jaunts, to previews, and to dinner in the evenings. The highest Beery compliment is to award anyone companionship with Carole Ann!

If Miss Nawrocki and Wally marry (and they may have announced it before this article reaches print), Aurella will have for a groom the one completely unique man in the history of entertainment. There are no carbon copies of Wallace Beery. One of the most widely known actors in the world, he is at the same time Hollywood's least known individual. Wally has a genius for keeping his life story, as well as his personal affairs, to himself, but what you do learn about him is varied, interesting, and exciting.

Earning power, for example. If you ask twenty people who is the biggest earner in all entertainment history, probably not one would mention Wally, yet he stands head and shoulders above all competition. In fact the works of no man, whether in entertainment or in any field of human expression, have ever drawn down the hard-cash total that has been grossed by Beery movies! To prove that is fairly easy. Wally, for example, has made thirty-three pictures for his present employer, Metro-Goldywn-Mayer. Some have been expensive ventures like "Viva Villa" and "The Champ"; others have been closer to B pictures than Metro ever admits making. But those thirty-three pictures have averaged around three million dollars apiece, never falling too far below, never rising more than a few hundred thousand (chicken-feed when you talk of Beery films) above. For example, "Viva· Villa," highly praised by the critics, grossed two million, five-hundred thousand. "Jackass Mail," just one of those hello-pardner, outdoor opuses, piled up more than three million.

When plans were being laid for the two million, five-hundred thousand dollar technicolor film, "Salute To The Marines," much of the best brains of M-G-M's lot was called in. This would be an attempt to top all past pictures of the Marines. The Marine Corps itself was asked to send advisers . . . and did. The story, all agreed, was a hummer. Marilyn Maxwell, for whom Metro officials have great hopes as a future star, was to be importantly launched. Someone expressed surprise to Louis B. Mayer, vice-president in charge of production, that so much money was to be massed behind a Beery picture. That wise gentleman, "L.B.," smiled: "It's one sure way to know we'll get our money back!"

Mr. Mayer must have had past records, as well as knowledge of the one hundred millon dollars Metro had grossed on Beery's pictures. Wally had worked in nineteen pictures for Paramount. Paramount won't talk about their grosses, but those nineteen were among the biggest earners in the company's history. And—before that—he worked for company after company in batch after batch of money-making films, all the way back through Keystone, Essanay, and the famous Mack Sennet comedies, to the very earliest companies—Tannhauser and Edison. There has been a saying in picture business since 1906—"The latest Beery picture is the best."

Wally guesses he has made three hundred pictures, all told. We lop fifty off that, just to be conservative. Careful investigation can find record of only one money-loser, "Old Ironsides." (And Jesse Lasky, who produced it, says, "That flop was all my fault, not Wally's.") So . . . give a thought to Metro's one hundred million dollars for thirty-three pictures. Remember, too, that some of the oldest (Continued on page 79)

The Charm of DINAH SHORE

After reading this story, you'll understand why Dinah wins all hearts whenever she sings

BY ALICE TRAINE

"DINAH, sing 'So Nice to Come Home To!' "

"Sing 'As Time Goes By,' Dinah!"

"Sing this . . ."

"Sing that . . ."

"Dinah! Dinah! Dinah!"

That's the way Uncle Sam's nephews in uniform carry on when Dinah Shore visits army camps and hospitals or sings at the Hollywood Canteen on Friday nights. If she doesn't know a song, they teach her, throwing her lines as she sings.

It's all very noisy and big brotherish, and it's lots of fun. She's number one favorite singer with the armed forces, not to mention merchant marine and men in hospitals, and there's nothing she'd rather do than sing for them.

"They're so real!" she explains. "They keep me on my toes."

She's slim and young and exactly the right size; her eyes are warm and brown, her mouth generous and sweet; she has more than a trace of Southern accent, and in spite of being strictly a 1943 Model Miss there's something gentle and even humble about her.

She listens to advice — sincere advice. If people bother to make suggestions to her, she'll try them out eagerly. No "public be damned" attitude for her. She has red gold hair, worn in a long bob—that's her "public's" idea. Once she arranged her curls in what she considered a very slick hair-do, divided in back, swirled around, and pinned high on her head. But, the minute she appeared on the stage, her audience cried, "Get a load of Dinah's hair!" She called for a comb, took her hair down right there, to approving applause.

Her name isn't really Dinah, it's Dinah and the Hollywood Canteen. She's a regular visitor; she sings, and dances with the lads, too.

Even when she vacations as far away from Hollywood as Nevada's Rancho Vegas, soldiers still discover Dinah, who is their favorite singer.

Dinah, beginning an important movie career with "Thank Your Lucky Stars" for Warners', scored so decisively that three other major productions are now lined up for her.

Frances Rose Shore . . . of Tennessee. She sang "Dinah" so often at Vanderbilt University that her college mates nicknamed her so, and she liked it better than her own name.

"I was tired of corny jokes. 'Franny sat on a tack. Franny rose!' Things like that. You can laugh the first six dozen times. 'Dinah Shore' looks better in lights, too, and I wanted to put it there. So when I set out for New York, I thought, 'Why do I tell them my name's Frances Rose? They never heard of me. I'll be Dinah Shore!' "

There's nothing particularly outstanding about her, Dinah insists, except that she's been lucky.

"Our family was never very rich, never very poor. I was never very beautiful, but never very ugly. I was born in Winchester, Tennessee; when I was seven, we moved to Nashville, where I went to school, played hopscotch, went to high school, became cheer leader, and never missed a football game.

"There's no romantic plantation in the family, but we did grow vegetables in the backyard. They weren't called victory gardens then. Every summer we all went on vacations together. No family feuds—we loved each other, like most families. No struggle, no suffering."

She had two colored mammies—Yama (short for Mary Emma) who was Mammy to Dinah's sister and cared for the new baby at first, then Yaya (short for Lillian) who came to cope with Frances Rose when she began to walk, and who still sends her young charge enormous chocolate cakes for birthday treats. Yaya ruled the household with an iron hand, as all good mammies do. To this day Dinah can't bring herself to speak what Yaya calls "naughty words."

Dinah loved to sing, but no one in the home town marvelled at her voice.

"Naturally, people in Nashville would rather listen to someone who didn't live around there," observed the star, "so I wasn't urged to give out with songs. But once a man who owned a night club offered to pay me ten dollars if I'd sing two songs there.

"Down home we don't go out to night clubs. We entertain in our own homes. None of the kids had ever been inside one. I was about fourteen. The other kids got hold of a car and drove me to the back door and waited outside while I slid in. It would have been terrible for them if they'd been seen in the club. I was shaky myself. When I came out for my first song, the first thing I saw was Daddy and Mother sitting at a table up front. They'd had word and came to see whether it was true. I was so scared I could hardly get my breath. When I was finished, Daddy beckoned to me, and they took me home without my ten dollars. It was four weeks before I was allowed to go out again Saturday nights."

During her high school days, Dinah's mother died. They had been so close that Dinah's father realized she needed something to help her through dark days. He didn't approve of the stage, but when the "47 Workshop" organized Little Theatre groups throughout the South and Dinah was offered an opportunity to join one of them, he agreed to permit it. In a small town twenty miles from Nashville, the future star of radio and screen played a score of leading roles from Jo in "Little Women" to a highly dramatic part in "Outward Bound."

This stage experience didn't soften Mr. Shore toward a theatrical career for his younger daughter. Graduating from college, she proposed that she go to New York and "try to sing or something." Her father refused his blessing.

"He didn't throw me out, though," remembered Dinah, with a smile. "He said if I insisted on going, I'd be on my own. I had a little money from Mother, but Daddy said he knew she wouldn't approve, and did I think it would be right to use that money? So I pawned my camera and enlarger and used that money.

"I really couldn't stay home. At home when you're twenty, you ought to be married. By the time you're twenty-three, you should have at least three children or you don't rate. I hadn't met anyone I wanted to marry, so I had nothing to contribute to life there. I wanted to sing and act."

Life in New York wasn't so uncomplicated as life in Nashville. A tiny apartment with another girl singer, cheap though it was, simply ate up money. Dinah got a job singing on a sustaining program at a small radio station; it paid no salary, merely gave opportunity for recognition that failed to come.

New Year's Eve, Dinah finished her last song on the program and stepped out on the street. She had exactly one dime to her name. She wasn't worried, for she had an engagement to sing at a New Year's party for twenty-five dollars. She looked at (Continued on page 81)

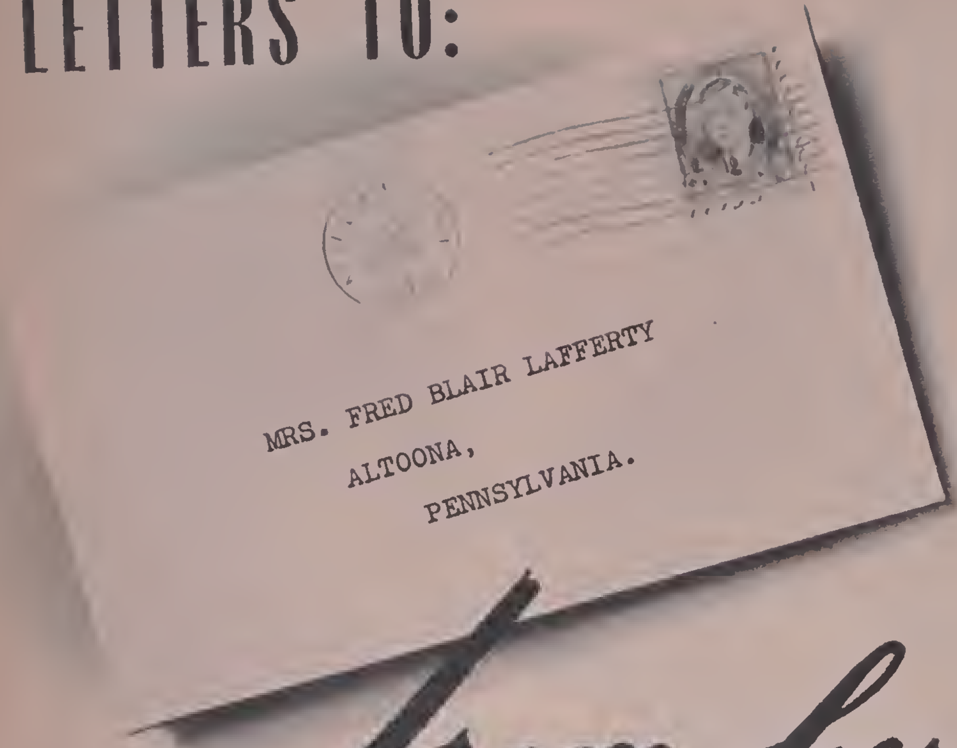
LETTERS TO:



MRS. FRED BLAIR LAFFERTY
ALTOONA, PENNSYLVANIA.

from her daughter Janet Blair

Miss Janet Blair and Sgt. Louis Busch. That's what they were just two days before Blair became Busch when this was taken.

July 5, 1939.

DEAREST MOTHER:

You will just have to get used to my Letters (and Love of capitalizing Everything) from now on, because since yesterday when you saw me Off at the Altoona station I am a Career Woman who will be traveling constantly. Yes, Mother, I got the job—I am the singer with Hal Kemp's Band, and not only that but here in Pittsburgh they gave me a new name, namely Janet Blair (Dad's middle name) instead of Janet Lafferty. I should feel Glamorous with all this, but still feel like your eighteen-year-old Daughter just out of High School, but that will Change.

Tell Dad that his friend Mr. Holden, the Manager of the band, has been simply Divine to me as have all the wives in the band, too, though Acting as though I were still a Child instead of a grown up and earning my own living, as of noon today.

(You can read this much Aloud to Sis and Brother and Dad. But from here on the letter is Private.)

Mother, you know how I've always been a Man-Hater? How I was too busy with my Singing Lessons to have dates for my whole senior year? Well, that's all Changed now, because today along with finding my Career I found the Man I am going to marry some day. Now, don't say I'm being silly and Emotional, because I know. (Even if he doesn't.)

I saw him the minute I walked in to take my try-out as a singer. And the minute I saw him, I knew. Maybe it is Woman's Intuition finally working. Anyway, I knew. He's the pianist and arranger of Mr. Kemp's band, and he was sitting at the piano waiting to give me my try-out. To be Honest, he doesn't like me yet, and he showed it immediately by simply Glaring at my best street outfit—that striped Skirt and brown sweater, and my yellow beanie with the long feather sticking up in it, and my best Saddle-shoes—the ones with the tassels—and of course Bobbie socks. Naturally, Bobbie socks.

Anyhow, he Glared. Then he said Curtly, "Come on, kid," and instead of letting me sing, he dragged me around the corner to a drug store where he had coffee and I had a Choc Malt, and he tried to give me a lot of Advice about what a nice scrubbed kid I was, and why didn't I skip this Nightclub Racket and go back home to Altoona, Pa., and get Married and have children? So I said, "Until now I have not been interested in Men, and besides I wish to be a Singer." He continued to argue, but I remained Firm. So finally he had to let me sing for him, and then he Glared again and said, "Okay, the job's yours," and left looking very angry. Why I don't know. Except maybe he knows I am his Fate and he is Squirming as some Men do.

I am yawning so much I will swallow this Letter if I don't close now. Love to Dad and Brother and Sis from

Their About-to-be-Famous-and-Married relative

Janet.

February 10, 1940.

Dear Mother:

I did not call you Dearest this time on purpose, because I am so angry over your repeated letters on the same subject, of Marriage. You needn't be worried over my marrying at eighteen, because he is Blind to Me, and I will probably be fifty years old before he even Dates me. So far it is three months since I joined the band, and he hasn't so much as looked at me, except to make sure I get on the Trains all right and going to get my Purse and Coat for me everywhere, as I am still leaving them behind me just as I did Home. He is taking Dad's place in his own Mind. It is utterly Maddening. Sometimes I think he will never know I am a Woman and he is a Man. But I will be patient.

So you need not worry about me Running Off with him—I would only be able to if I knocked him Unconscious first and then Dragged him Away.

I am very bitter tonight. Goodbye.

Janet.

P. S.: You said I haven't even Described him or called him anything but him. So here goes: His name is Louis Busch, he is twenty-eight, he comes from Louisville, Kentucky, he's played with many bands including Horace Heidt, George Olson, and Henry Busse

One note to put on your must list is this: Be sure to see Mrs. Janet Blair Busch in her next picture which she is making for Columbia Pictures, called "The Heart of a City."

At the right: Here the bride and groom are in an after-the-ceremony pose. And maybe that smile isn't something for a soldier to dream about and want to come home to!

(however he gets Glazed Eyed with Boredom when I try to talk music with him, based on my many years with the Altoona Church Choir. This is his One Fault). Description: Stocky, taller than I am but not much, green eyes, blondish thick hair . . . and Dimples.

You will think I am Crazy, but I have had Dimples too since I met him, one on each side of my Mouth. Fate Again, I think. What do you think? Answer!!!

Yours,
Janet.

MRS. FRED BLAIR LAFFERTY,

I AM SENDING THIS TELEGRAM COLLECT BECAUSE IT MAY BE LONG. IT IS ABOUT OUR FIRST DATE—LOUIS FINALLY ASKED ME OUT TONIGHT HERE IN ATLANTA GEORGIA. WE WENT TO A MOVIE HE LOOKED AT IT BUT I LOOKED AT HIM, BUT HE DIDN'T NOTICE THAT I AM SURE. THEN WE HAD A SODA AND THEN HE TOOK ME BACK TO THE BOARDING HOUSE AND BEGAN READING THE SUNDAY FUNNIES, THIS BEING SUNDAY. HE WAS STILL READING THEM WHEN I WENT UPSTAIRS TO BED AN HOUR LATER BUT ROSEMARY MY ROOMMATE SAID MEN WERE LIKE THAT. I CARE NOT ANYWAY IF I HAVE TO SHARE HIM WITH DICK TRACY AND L'IL ABNER THAT IS ALL RIGHT WITH ME. DELIRIOUSLY YOURS

JANET.

August 16, 1940.

Dearest Mother:

Oh, I am so Miserable and Blue I could Die. If I hadn't promised I'd never send you another wire Collect until I was Engaged or Married I would send you one tonight, because the most tragical thing of my Life has happened, namely we have had our First Quarrel. And it is all my Fault. And everything has been going so well up to now, ever since Atlanta—Dates quite a lot and everything.

What happened was this. We are in St. Petersburg, Florida, and it is so Hot here that your clothes are hopelessly wrinkled unless you Iron them after unpacking. So I got out my traveling Iron to press my pale blue formal for tonight, and there was Nothing to Iron on because the woman who runs this boarding house had put away all my Suitcases. So then I remembered Louis' new Imported Leather trunk which is never moved because it has all (Continued on page 80)

BETTING ON CHAPMAN

by DOROTHY DEERE

"THREE across the board on Chapman—to win, place, and show!"

In good old gambling parlance, the chips are down on Marguerite Chapman. Columbia has backed Maggie, at the cost of three major productions, which is undoubtedly one of the biggest bets ever made by a studio on a hitherto minor player.

During the three years which have elapsed since Maggie gave up a well-paying model's job in New York to try her hand—or rather, her face—at pictures, she has become known to certain other people as certain other things . . .

A Hollywood hostess knows her as the girl who made her first timid party entrance head over heels, down the broad stairway of a film mogul's home, into a surprised salon-full of guests.

A Hollywood poseur, who inevitably tosses newcomers the line that they'll never be actresses until they have "suffered," remembers her as the youngster who looked him coolly in the eye and said, "But I have suffered. I've seen every one of your paintings!"

To Howard Hughes she is one of the several young ladies he tested for the buxom lead in "The Outlaw" and rejected because she had too much above the eyebrows and not quite enough below the necklace. To Hal Wallis of Warners' she is the slim young thing who, after being briefly ballyhooed as one of the long stemmed beauts in the "Navy Blues" sextette, cried for the lead in "Sergeant York" and couldn't have it because, even in a gingham sack, she had too much style for a hill-jilly. And to Charles Boyer she is eternally grateful, but that's for another part of the story.

Today at Columbia, Marguerite is now a Grade A-1 leading woman, indisputably entitled to all the privileges and luxuries that go with that rank—the plushily furnished private dressing room, the canvas chair with her name painted across the back, the specially designed wardrobes and hair-dos.

On the Gower Street lot, Marguerite is all of a sudden Something (Capital S). She doesn't have to talk to people who slap her on the back, unless she wants to. She's through with cheesecake art—she had attained that exalted state all actresses long for, when she dares to report to the still gallery in a long skirt, knowing that her face is now as important as her lissom legs.

With Columbia, Marguerite's talent is no longer in the wager stage—they have seen the evidence in the theatre and audience reaction to her in "Destroyer" and "Appointment in Berlin." Rapidly nearing completion is further proof in the form of a third expensive opus (Continued on page 77)

Below—A Midsummer Day's Dream is our name for this picture of Marguerite relaxing in the California sun.

Below—Again—lovely is the word for Maggie. But read about one dressing-table experience la Chapman had, and you'll find she's a lot of other things besides just lovely.

THOUSANDS CHEER

ONLY that moment before there had been confusion and bustle and noise, a babbling of thousands of voices punctuated by crisp military commands. But now the station was so quiet you could hear a heart drop as boys in khaki turned to the girls they were leaving, holding them closer than they ever had before, because they felt they might never be together again like this, close kissed and eager.

Kathryn Jones felt her throat tightening looking at them. It made her feel lonely and left out of things, the only girl in the world without a boy to say goodbye to. Then as she looked on wistfully she was conscious of a boy standing beside her, a boy with arrogant, bitter eyes staring from her to all those breathless twosomes and then back again, mocking her as he was mocking them and this pattern of farewell.

There was a piercing whistle and then voices again. "All right, men, get aboard!" Arms clung tighter then, trying to prolong the seconds left to them, and as Kathryn sighed sympathetically her eyes locked with the boy's eyes once again.

His look was as deliberate as the gesture with which he flung his half smoked cigarette on the ground, as his heel grinding down on it. He took her in his arms with an assurance coming from long practice and his lips pressed hard on her mouth. Then just as smoothly and deliberately he released her again.

"So long, baby," his voice exaggerated the emotion of all the whispered goodbyes around them. "And don't forget to write."

Kathryn was too dazed to say a word as she stared after him. Then she started guiltily as she heard her name called and turned to see her mother and father coming towards her. But they hadn't seen anything. They were as aloof and composed as they had been when she had left them scarcely ten minutes before.

Maybe it had been silly, manoeuvering so carefully to leave them alone, thinking a miracle might happen and that a few minutes could patch up the differences of years. They looked as if they belonged together—the tall man in a Colonel's uniform and the slender, Eddie, a lonely soldier, feels he should kiss someone. It seems to be a railroad station custom. So he grabs and smacks a pretty stranger, Miss Jones.

After bursting in on Miss Jones' compartment to explain that he meant absolutely nothing by his kiss, Eddie discovers her father's the Colonel lovely woman, but Kathryn could see they were still as far apart as they had been in all the years when the distance that separated them was real, not just psychological.

"You'd better get on board, Kathryn," the Colonel said. "I'll join you in your compartment later." He held out his hand to the woman who had once been his wife. "Goodbye, Hyllary, I'm glad to have seen you."

"Goodbye, Bill," Hyllary smiled as she gave him her hand. "Take care of her."

They were still being so casual, so civilized. Even quarreling, Kathryn thought resentfully, even bitterness would be better than this.

"You're supposed to kiss," she protested in a small despairing voice. "Everybody does, even strangers."

She could see that her father's eyes crinkled at the corners when he laughed. There were so many things she had yet to find out about him and, even though it meant leaving her mother, Kathryn was glad that she was going to know him at last. Every girl should meet her father sometime, and she was glad she had got the chance when she was still young. Oh, why couldn't she have them both, the three of them together always. It would be so wonderful to be part of a family.

All the aloofness went from her mother's eyes as she kissed Kathryn goodbye. They had always been so close, bound even closer with their common love of music, and Hyllary had been so proud when Kathryn had become the singer for Jose Iturbi's orchestra. Yet Hyllary hadn't hesitated when the Colonel had asked that his daughter be allowed to accompany him to the California training camp where she was to be a sort of recreation officer. Hyllary knew how important morale was in war time.

"Goodbye, darling," she said. And then whispering, close to Kathryn's ears "Silly little Kitty Kat, now that you have a chance to be with your father for awhile I want you to accept it and enjoy it and not worry yourself trying to put Humpty Dumpty together again, don't you see?"

Kathryn didn't see. She hated that off hand salute her father gave as he strode off, her mother's impersonal smile. She was so intent on her own thoughts about them both as she got on the train it was something of a shock to run smack up against the young soldier who had kissed her those few moments before. She had forgotten all about him.

But the boy hadn't forgotten. His face reddened when he saw her. All his defenses were down with his arrogance gone. Kathryn stifled a giggle as she saw he looked positively frightened.

"Hey now, wait a minute," he protested. "Just because I kissed you doesn't mean you have to follow me around."

Kathryn couldn't do anything but just stare at him. She had never met up with such egotism in her life.

"I kiss a lotta girls," the boy went on. "It don't mean a thing!"

"Oh, but it does," Kathryn insisted wickedly. He'd had his fun with her, now she was going to have her own. "It means everything! It means that we're engaged, and I'm going to follow you to the ends of the earth."

"But you can't." He was gulping in his nervousness. "This train's for soldiers!"

She flung him a reckless, mad little smile. "Don't tell anybody I'm here," she whispered warningly. She turned as she reached her compartment and saw him standing there, dazed and uncomfortable, and gave him a wink as she closed the door behind her.

Top left—At the court martial after he has served time in the guardhouse for leaving his post, Eddie realizes his wrong and pleads guilty.

Middle left—Almost reunion. After their first happy greetings, Hyllary says she doesn't approve Army life for Kathryn. A bad influence.

Bottom left—At the huge USO show she has planned, Kathryn sings to the accompaniment of her friend, Jose Iturbi. (It's his movie debut.)

Bottom—The Colonel and his lady say goodbye before he sails. They shake hands briefly, then kiss. Once again they're a happy, united family.

Her father was there waiting. He was really so handsome with those laughing blue eyes of his, with just that touch of gray in his dark hair, and yet she couldn't help that feeling of annoyance with him. It had really been too mean of him spoiling all her plans like that.

"Well," her voice was a little defiant, "what did you think about my mother? Isn't she wonderful?"

"I don't know," he said quietly. "Is she?"

"Oh, come on," Kathryn sighed. "What did she say? What did you say? After all you were practically marooned with the woman for ten minutes there. Something must have happened."

If only he wouldn't look so amused.

"I said she had done very well with you, and she said I'd done very well with the army. I asked her what was new in the world of music, and she said it was still very harmonious. She told me she saw where my line of business was hitting the front pages lately, and I expressed surprise that she ever read things like that. After that our conversation grew rather chilly. Anything else?"

"Aw, Dad." Kathryn couldn't hold back her disappointment. "If I had a wife I hadn't seen in years I'd—" Suddenly she stopped as the door was flung open completely hiding her father, and the boy stood in the doorway.

"Now look," he said. "The only reason I kissed you was because everybody was kissing everybody else, and that's the only reason. You don't mean a thing to me. I told you that before, and I came back to say it again. You don't mean a thing to me."

"Just a minute soldier!" the Colonel said sternly, stepping out from behind the door. But as the boy stiffened to attention, his voice lost its sharpness. "What's your name, son?"

"Private Marsh, sir," the boy said. "Private Eddy Marsh."

Kathryn couldn't resist a giggle. "How do you do?" she said demurely.

Her father flung her an amused glance. "You keep out of this," he ordered. "You don't mean a thing to him." His eyes met Eddy's. "Does she?"

"No, sir."

"Then," the Colonel made a gesture of dismissal, "unless you have something further to say—"

"No, sir, I haven't." Eddy's mouth tightened. "Except that from now on I only kiss women I know." He saluted, but he couldn't resist that scowl at Kathryn as he walked out. "You and me are washed up for good," he said.

"And—" The Colonel walked over and sat down beside his daughter—"you and I are going to have a man to man talk." But they didn't. For just then the train's whistle gave a derisive "whoo-whoo" and the Colonel joined in with Kathryn's laughter. It was wonderful finding not only a father, but a father with a sense of humor.

Private Eddy Marsh kept an aloof moody distance, not only from Kathryn but from everybody else on the trip to California. Not for him the impromptu sing songs, Kathryn got up to amuse the boys, not for him the bantering fun that linked all the rest of the troop train together. For Private Eddy Marsh was pretty bitter about this whole army business. He wouldn't have any truck with regimentation or discipline or even fun when that fun meant being part of any army. No, sir! He'd remain an individual to the end.

It was the same at camp. Eddy kept to his proud sullen self. And he never as much as flicked his eyes in Kathryn's direction though at that it would have been pretty difficult, hidden as she always was by all those khaki backs clustered around her, begging her for a dance or to sing another song. Then one evening they met face to face at the crowded soda fountain in the Service Club. There had been a dance, and Kathryn looked so gay and lovely in her long white evening frock, but no one would have known it from Eddy's antagonized stare.

"What's the matter," Kathryn grinned. "Don't you like the soda?"

"Soda's all right," he agreed grudgingly.

ADVICE TO WAR-LORN WIVES

Laraine Day Who Is One Herself Gives Out With Some Sensible Advice

"WHAT'S the use of our men winning the war if they lose their wives? To fight for something and then come back and find that it isn't there any more—that it's gone, disappeared? The greatest danger confronting war brides and girls with boy friends in the service is this: as we make adjustments, solve our problems alone, make our own livings, pay our bills, assume new obligations, and in some instances even carry on the business of our husbands, we women may become too self-reliant. We may cease being feminine. That would be a dreadful thing for our men to return to."

It was Laraine Day, who is a "war-lorn bride" speaking. One of the most beautiful young girls on the screen, Laraine is also one of the most thoughtful. I saw now that she was thinking deeply.

"We are fighting to preserve our democracy," she said, "our American way of life, the foundation of which is the American home. That home is based on certain traditional relationships between wife and husband. Women are the mothers of the race, in a physical as well as spiritual sense. Even in wartime, the wife must remain true to her destiny—in other words, be feminine. It would be entirely women's fault if in working, striving, sacrificing for and with our men, we inadvertently destroy the very thing we're trying to preserve."

Laraine has something which sets her apart from the majority of Hollywood's professional charmers—a tender, subtle, mother-of-the-race quality. She isn't a flamboyant blonde, though she has the curves and coloring. She isn't one of the town's celebrated "pin-up" girls. But judging by her fan mail, the boys in the camps think of marriage at sight of her.

"They all want me to be their wife," she laughs. "I get such flattering letters from them. And mothers write me, too, saying they'd want their sons to marry a girl like me. Apparently they don't know I'm already married."

Her husband, Ray Hendricks, ex-singer, is in the Army Air Corps Reserve as a civilian aviation instructor. They met originally because Laraine loves to give plays and produce sixteen millimeter pictures with the help of studio stenographers, prop boys, and other studio employees, many of whom nurse violent ambitions to be stars, directors, writers.

Laraine needed a leading man for one of her shows, one who could sing. Friends recommended Ray Hendricks. He not only got the part, but Laraine, too, in the bargain. They married in May, 1942, but until recently war separated them sometimes for months. Ray has now been transferred to Oxnard, California, not so far from Hollywood but that they are able to spend their week-ends together.

"I was confronted with the question of the wisdom of wartime marriage," Laraine said. "No matter how much you're in love, you can't help wondering, in times like these, whether it's wise. There's that inner, universally feminine fear that you might end up an old maid if you don't marry. On the other hand, with your husband in service, you have to live without him, or see him rarely. He may be wounded, come back minus a leg or arm . . . or not come back at all.

"I weighed all these things, as so many girls are doing today. I decided to marry . . . and am so glad I did. I've had a lot of happiness, and I refuse to worry. Courage is a virtue for women, too."

Should a girl live alone, or with his or her parents, while her husband is away? Laraine lives in a French Colonial house in Brentwood, a house with four bedrooms and four baths, and there are times when it seems awfully empty to her.

"No matter what a girl's circumstances," she says, "I believe she's better off if she lives alone, sets up her own household, even if she has to do it in a single room. I'm opposed to living with in-laws, definitely. As to living in or near a camp, I think it is a burden on the husband, and creates many new responsibilities for him . . . unless the wife can really find a place in which to make a home for both of them. That's possible, but I don't think it happens very often.

"To me, the best thing a service wife can do is to visit her husband as often as permitted. She should plan those visits in advance, always according to his wishes and free time, and with the idea of pleasing him uppermost in her mind. When you've been married a short time, you sometimes wonder after your separation, with its terrific tensions: does my husband really exist? You keep thinking of him all the time. He is always in your thoughts. Then when you see him again, it seems a sort of miracle. Yes, you say to yourself, he does exist. He isn't a product of my imagination. I can touch him, I can kiss him.

"Such a visit is a big event. A girl should make the most of it. My tip is: go in for a bit of glamour. Make yourself as attractive as possible—make your man proud of you, for there are other wives at the camp. Clothes are important. I wear sport clothes and take a short evening dress with me . . . just in case. In officers' clubs parties and dances might be formal. A girl can work in an aircraft factory or a shipyard and still be glamourous, on occasion. Incidentally, I'm very much in favor of war brides working. I'm a working girl myself. There are so many jobs now open to women, many of them directly and vitally connected with the war.

"A visit to a camp is a big date. And all the good rules for dates would apply to it. That means don't be too possessive and aggressive. Be on time. Don't make him wait. Don't put on an act. Be yourself. Make him feel important, very important to you. Don't lose your sense of humor. And, above all, be kind. Kindness is just another word for femininity. And, remember, in a camp you may find yourself close to the grim realities of war."

Laraine recalled a visit to her husband in Phoenix, Arizona. "Ray was teaching blind flying to the British cadets at Falcon Field. Just before I got there, two British boys had been accidentally killed. I never came into a place more depressed than that field that day. The English boys all seemed so much younger than our boys. They were so lonely, and so humble, so grateful for the slightest favor. We Americans take so many luxuries for granted. As I talked to them, I was shaking inside. I could tell by their eyes they had seen a lot, that they had really suffered, and they would have to be in battle as soon as they got back to their native land. As I tried to cheer up those nice polite boys in their shabby uniforms, I kept wondering whether they would be alive in six months."

Laraine was silent for a moment; then she said, "Loneliness is an almost universal disease these days. We all need recreation and friends. Even genius, which flourishes in solitude, needs these. We can't live alone; we are social beings. Yet I disapprove a woman having dates with other men while separated from her husband because of the war. A girl can have a lot of fun with a group of married friends. A couple may be generous enough to invite her to dinner, or if worst comes to worst, she can go to a show alone, and learn to like it."

As for dancing and such pleasant and patriotic pastimes in U.S.O. centers, Laraine thinks they are more proper for single girls. The lonely war bride, finding herself alone in the company of so many attractive, healthy, and lonely young men, would be exposed to temptations, human nature being what it is.

But there are many other activities to absorb her energies and keep her busy—an old, time-honored cure for loneliness. "Take Bob Cummings' wife," said Laraine. "She has been taking flying lessons in Nevada and studying navigation to serve with the ferry command and thus replace a man who'd be more useful in actual combat service.

"There certainly is no glamour in giving bed baths and emptying bed pans, but the nurse's aide, nevertheless, has the satisfaction of knowing that she is doing a vital war job, and she can feel pretty heroic about it.

"Not everybody can take that, perhaps, but almost everybody in good health can give a pint of blood to the Red Cross. I just returned from a tour of fifteen cities on behalf of the Red Cross Blood Bank. Frankly, when they brought a portable blood bank on the set of my last picture, 'Mr. Lucky,' I was scared. But giving a pint of blood wasn't half bad. You feel a little weak for a while, that's all. It would be a good idea if they would label the blood containers with the names of their donors. Then a soldier could go around and say, 'You know, I've Cary Grant's blood in me—he saved my life.' Or Clark Gable's, or Charles Boyer's.

"Or if you can't do that, you can always write letters. My tip is write every day, but don't make your letters too long. When you write every day you escape the danger of being dull. By being brief, you can say something new every day.

"I don't agree with the prevalent notion that the letters of a war bride should always be cheerful. Under that ruling, the husband might feel that everything was going so smoothly that she doesn't need him. Let him worry a little. Make him

MOVIELAND'S Beauty Parlo

Wash your neck with a good, mild soap and warm water . . . after, of course, you have applied and removed your cleansing cream as described below.

Take just as good care of your neck as your face, advises Frances Rafferty, MGM actress. Every night start with two applications of cleansing cream, removed with tissue. And be sure to use the fundamental movement of massage—upward and outward.

After your soap and water treatment, pat your night cream on with your finger tips, again using the upward, outward, circular motion. Pat up to and beyond your ears. For under your chin, Frances says you should use the backs of your fingers.

For double and flabby chins—and Miss Rafferty, we assure you, has neither—do this after your nightly cleansing: Soak a piece of absorbent cotton in skin freshener or astringent and hold it beneath your chin for at least five minutes. It really will help.

THE holiday season is bringing its dreamy, child-like air into our beauty parlor.

Even more than ever, in wartime beauty remains in the foreground as an ever-present topic of conversation. This tired world needs every bit of feminine beauty which can be produced.

The immediate effect around Hollywood these days is that every star and starlet is searching around for new and more startling hairstyles . . . but they agree that hair must remain on top of the head, with a "dressed," completely feminine look.

Facial bookings are their heaviest, because what woman doesn't want her complexion to bloom its loveliest at Christmas and the New Year?

All of which is our way of leading up to this month's lecture in the Movieland Beauty Parlor. For, speaking of facials, whenever you've had one, you've probably noticed how much attention your operator pays to your neck, along with your face. There's a reason: beauty isn't supposed to end at the jaw and chin-line, and don't ever forget that true fact that your neck ages before your face!

Bearing this in mind and having, on many an occasion been shocked upon noticing an aged neck under an unlined face, we decided our Christmas beauty present to you should be a practical talk on the subject. So hang on to your cold cream jars, girls, for here we go.

From twenty on, every woman should take the exact same care of her neck as she does of her face.

That's our neck orders in a sentence.

Just for some of you beauty laggards who may still remain unacquainted with the correct procedures of cleansing, we asked Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's pretty Frances Rafferty to illustrate some of the more important points. Incidentally, you'll soon be seeing Frances in "Girl Crazy," starring your two favorites, Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney. But on with the matter of cleansing . . .

In the nightly procedure, the initial step is, of course, two applications of cleansing cream, each of which is removed with tissue.

The method of application is of importance. Starting at the base of your neck, the cream should be applied in an upward, outward, circular motion. This is the elementary movement of massage, remember? Even your use of tissue should be handled in the same way, and it doesn't take a bit more time than slathering your cream on in any old fashion or dabbing haphazardly with tissue.

Now, we come to the important question of soap. What kind are you using? Preferably, it should be a good, mild soap, and super-fatted. Any druggist or beauty counter will be happy to recommend such a soap. You see, along with many famous beauty experts, we, too, believe there can be no thorough cleansing of face or neck without the use of soap and warm water, so lather it well into the cloth and get on with the scrubbing act. Gently does it, however!

It's of special benefit, too, if you do as Frances does and slosh three or four rinsings of cold water onto your head-holder-upper. It helps the circulation, in turn stimulating the skin.

On to your night cream and a five-minute exercise. Think you can spare those minutes? You'll never be sorry in the years to come!

And do you recall that upward, outward, circular motion we were harping on? Use it again; only this time, pat the cream into the skin with the tips of your fingers, as does Frances. Don't, above all, forget to continue the patting process (Continued on page 87)

Movieland Selects Five "Best" Pictures This Month

JANE EYRE

(20th Century-Fox)

CHARLOTTE BRONTE'S classic novel reaches the screen as an enormously moving drama of a woman's love. Playing the title role of "Jane Eyre," Joan Fontaine attains new heights to substantiate the Academy Award she won for a far lesser performance. Something of matchless appeal arises from her interpretation of the elfin-faced girl who comes to grim, foreboding Thornfield Hall to accept the position as governess of Edward Rochester's little French ward. Hers is a full rounded character as one utterly unacquainted with happiness until she finds it in love for a man even then married to a mad creature he keeps hidden in a barred tower of his castle.

Just as this superb Jane Eyre steps directly from the pages of Bronte, so, too, is Orson Welles magnificently right physically as Rochester. It happens that the swashbuckling he is permitted frequently offends as downright overacting, for all the magnificence of its manner. His work would be of more value for an ounce of restraint, a word with which Welles is totally unfamiliar. Still the fine calibre of the film which is "Jane Eyre" cannot be spoiled by any such single false note. No woman will ever forget it.

Two splendid juvenile portrayals are contributed by Peggy Ann Garner as the ill-treated Jane as a child, and by Margaret O'Brien, of "Journey for Margaret" fame, in the role of the French ward. Mrs. Fairfax, the housekeeper, is excellent in the hands of Edith Barrett, as are Sara Allgood's Bessie and Agnes Moorehead's Aunt Reed. You will like John Sutton's Dr. Rivers and properly loathe Henry Daniell's evil Brocklehurst.

PRINCESS O'ROURKE

BY ITS own admission, "Princess O'Rourke" is a Cinderella story. Only everything is backwards, for the boy is Cinderella and the girl a royal princess born to the purple.

In this sparkling modern romantic comedy, Olivia de Havilland plays the Princess Maria, and Robert Cummings a transport airplane pilot named Eddie O'Rourke. They meet through the accident of Maria taking a few too many sleeping tablets. He has no reason to doubt the alias under which she is traveling and readily believes her yarn about being a refugee.

On their dates, they are shadowed by a secret service agent who reports every word to Maria's royal uncle. So it is no surprise to him that Eddie has proposed. Maria is the astonished one when the engagement gains the approval of her family. As for Eddie, he is dumfounded at the prospect of becoming a Prince Consort. The finale staged in the White House is riotous. It is there that Falla doubles for Cupid.

Olivia and Cummings are in excellent form as the romantic pair, Charles Coburn a joy as her uncle, and Jack Carson and Jane Wyman very able as a young married couple who are O'Rourke's buddies. Outstanding bits are contributed by the supporting cast.

Norman Krasna wrote and directed the exceptionally natural comedy just before departing Hollywood for Army service. It is a tribute to his craftsmanship that "Princess O'Rourke" has remained fresh and undated although the picture was completed more than a year ago. Your attention is particularly called to a satiric accompanying music score by Frederick Hollander. It furthers your enjoyment of the farce.

SWEET ROSIE O'GRADY

(20th Century-Fox)

HERE is not only one of the month's five best pictures, but probably the very best in which Betty Grable has ever appeared. "Sweet Rosie O'Grady" has a story that matches the vitality of its star and gives her the reliable Robert Young for a leading man to keep her stepping.

The period of the musical is that flamboyant decade known as the "Elegant Eighties," certainly an era which demanded the Technicolor in which it is photographed. An American stage star, who has scored a terrific hit in London and has become engaged to a Duke, returns to the States. She finds that a reporter on the Police Gazette has been busily running an expose which reveals her beginnings in a Bowery beer hall where she sang under her real name of Rosie O'Grady. Vowing to get even with the reporter, Rosie admits the truth of his charges and thus begins their battle of embarrassments that extends to the reaches of greater New York in the days of Delmonico's, Rector's, and Sherry's.

There are four lilting new songs by Mack Gordon and Harry Warren in the show. The dancing is way above par, and the comedy is really very funny. All this and Grable, too.

Reginald Gardiner steals more than his share of scenes as the Duke. Adolphe Menjou bounces in as the Police Gazette editor, and Virginia Grey gives Betty some competition in the glamor department. Those who have missed Phil Regan will be happy to greet him in the resumption of his film career. And Hermes Pan, the dance director who staged the musical numbers, again has been prevailed upon to appear on the screen as his star's dancing partner. Watch them step.

THANK YOUR LUCKY STARS

(Warner Bros.)

SECOND in this month's array of multiple-star musicals, "Thank Your Lucky Stars" bases its entertainment on the surprise value of seeing stars perform unexpected screen chores. For example, the usually dramatic Bette Davis appears to sing a torch song, a number which is the lament of a wartime lonely gal who says of the men she meets "They're Either Too Young or Too Old." Olivia de Havilland, Ida Lupino, and George Tobias team up in a hilarious parody on a hot-lick sister trio. Errol Flynn warbles a Cockney barroom ballad, hiding behind a handle-bar moustache. John Garfield does a tough-mugg interpretation of "Blues in the Night," and Ann Sheridan sings romantic advice to the effect that "Love Isn't Born, It's Made."

All of this should give you a rough idea of what "Thank Your Lucky Stars" is about. There are other surprises such as Alexis Smith dancing an adagio with two male partners, and Jack Carson and Alan Hale offering a corny act as an explanation of what helped kill vaudeville. There also is a story of sorts, a slight yarn about a guy who looked too much like Eddie Cantor to carve a career for himself. Cantor of course—need we say—plays both roles.

In its entirety, the picture is not so good as it should have been. Only because of its novelty is it recommended among the month's best. Dennis Morgan, as an aspiring singer, and Joan Leslie, as an amateur song writer, have parts that are unworthy of them. Nor is full advantage taken of the singing of Dinah Shore. It is S. Z. Sakall who walks off with the comedy honors as the producer of the charity benefit.

THOUSANDS CHEER

(MGM)

HOLLYWOOD is busily engaged in turning out all-star musicals this season. Almost every studio has made or is planning to make at least one such song and dance picture to utilize the talents of nearly the full roster of contract players on the lot. If you remember the pioneer talking pictures, you will recall a group of musical revues in the early days of sound on the screen. The present group is fast, funny, and extremely worth your while.

"Thousands Cheer" is Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's entry in the current crop of all-star musical extravaganzas. On page 51 of this issue you can read the plot of the story.

Kathryn Grayson, in splendid voice, is at her charming best as Private Miss Jones. It sets the little Grayson on the high road to film stardom. Gene Kelly plays the misfit rookie for a personal hit, and you'll thoroughly enjoy John Boles and Mary Astor as the Colonel and the Colonel's lady. Yet some of the brightest moments in the picture are provided by Jose Iturbi in a delightful movie debut. When this fine pianist plays boogie-woogie, he brings down the house, and we don't mean perhaps.

Mickey Rooney emcees the climaxing camp show which includes such grand entertainers as Judy Garland, Red Skelton, Ann Sothern, Lucille Ball, Lena Horne, Virginia O'Brien, Frank Morgan, and many other film favorites all in top form. With the troupe come the orchestras of Kay Kyser, Bob Crosby, and Benny Carter, and they are all terrific.

It adds up to swell, hot entertainment which entire families and all ages can equally enjoy. No matter who you are, you can't miss on this.

Claire Trevor tells this soldier hitch-hiking story. Her car broke down on the road while she was trying to make an early studio call at Columbia. She stood helplessly by, until a car slowed down for her. Two soldiers were in it. They were more than glad to drive her to the corner of Gower and Sunset. But no sooner had they driven away, than Claire discovered she had left her make-up kit in the car. She hailed a passing car frantically. There were three sailors in this one. They were happy to chase after the soldiers and retrieve the kit. The five of them wound up having lunch in Columbia's tiny commissary.

Maureen O'Hara is partial to service men, especially Marines, since her husband Will Price is in the Corps. She unwittingly caused a Marine to lose a $10 bet—and she thought she was doing him a favor.

A Marine approached her on the set and told her a heart-rending tale about his buddy who was lonesome for his girl at home. He laid it on thick, and as a result Maureen found herself promising the Marine to take his buddy to a radio broadcast with her.

Now Maureen is back with her husband at Quantico, Va. and it's the joke of the company, she learns that the heart-broken Marine lost a ten dollar bet because of her good deed. His buddy, the one who approached her, had wagered him that amount that he could get him a date with the beautiful, red-haired star!

INFORMATION ON ELLA RAINES

Wolves of the town are hanging around Ella Raines, who is the beauty under personal contract to Charles Boyer and director Howard Hawks. She is wonderful in "Corvettes in Action" at Universal, her first picture, and also in "Cry Havoc" at MGM her second.

Miss Raines is taking the place of all the last season's glamor girls rolled into one. She refuses all dates and only goes out with her mama. That beautiful emerald and diamond bracelet that she wears is not from a nameless admirer. He can be named. Her father sent it to her from Seattle upon completion of her first picture.

Tip to the boys: When you can afford to give Ella all the things her daddy does you might have a chance. It is a mighty expensive proposition for her father is very wealthy, and Miss Raines is used only to the best.

HOW WOULD YOU FEEL?

The pat phraseology of telephone operators is undergoing expansion these days, as Jean Brooks, star of RKO's "The Seventh Victim," discovered when she made a long distance call to New York, where her husband is stationed with the Signal Corps.

When the three minutes were up, the operator—evidently a newcomer to the job—cut in per schedule. Then she began to stutter frantically as she groped for the phrase she had been instructed to use at such times. Finally, in desperation, the operator turned original.

"Your time has come!" she warned the actress dismally.

Jean ended her conversation as abruptly as if the words had been pronounced by Gabriel himself.

JEANETTE MacDONALD IS A STUBBORN GAL

She insists upon raising bees . . . and now after her second bitter sting, she still insists. A few months ago, Jeanette was stung on the hand and wound up in the hospital taking sulpha. Last week she was stung on her ankle and at this writing is obediently tucked in bed with the bad foot strung up. Jeanette's doctor shakes his head wearily and warns her that she's allergic to bee stings, and to get rid of her apiary.

Jeanette calls her guests and breaks social engagements with a sense of humor. "So sorry I can't come to dinner. I was stung by a son of a bee."

VITAMINS FOR CARRADINE?

The other night at the Brown Derby actress Mary Rowland, who will make her film bow in United Artists' "The Moon, Their Mistress," was kidding John Carradine about his wraith-like figure. "Why don't you take vitamin pills?" she teased.

Carradine threw up his hands in horror. "Vitamins!" he snorted. "I'll have nothing to do with them. I suspect them of being a capitalistic invention designed to get more work out of labor—which is me."

Kathryn in for the soda maneuvered his way between her and Eddy. "Shall I sock him, Miss Jones?" he asked. But Kathryn shook her head.

"Never mind, Chuck. Let's go," she said.

The other boys, those who hadn't gone along with Kathryn for it was never possible for any boy to see her home alone, crowded around the still belligerent Eddy.

"How do you like that," the one named Sam said. "An individualist. Woman hater, huh?"

"I don't need her," Eddy said. "I got plans of my own. I'm leavin' this outfit."

"Going to resign from the Army?" some one mocked.

"No." Eddy stood his bitter ground. "I'm rigging up a little transfer. Air Corps, soldier, Air Corps. She hasn't got anything to do with that."

"Somethin' musta stunned your thinking," a boy called Jack put in. "Her father's the Colonel, ain't he? They talk things over, don't they. It don't do any harm to be nice to the boss's daughter."

"Come on, Jack," Sam said. "It ain't any good tryin' to tell ol' Big Brain Marsh what a chance he's missing."

Eddy hadn't thought of influence before. Well, why not, he decided squaring his shoulders. He'd do anything that would help him get in the Air Corps, anything that would give him a chance to be something on his own instead of just a private like millions of others. So what would be the harm in using the girl and her influence? Eddy decided there wouldn't be any at all, but when he reached the house he couldn't quite get up the nerve to go boldly up to the door and ring the bell.

From where he stood he could see the lighted window of the room on the second floor and Kathryn sitting at a desk writing a letter. And acting quickly, so he wouldn't have a chance to change his mind, he climbed up the trellis and sat astride the window sill.

"You think we got a future together?" He grinned as Kathryn stared in amazement.

"You've got a future in the guardhouse if you don't get out of here," she whispered with a warning glance toward her father's door. "Eddy, please, you'll get in trouble."

"I want to apologize," he said. "I changed my mind. I like the Army better, with you in it."

"That's not what you said a half hour ago," she said.

"That's what makes me so interesting," he said. "I'm undependable."

"What's the matter with you?" Her gray eyes looked at him curiously. "Why are you always so disagreeable? I can't figure you out."

"Tell you what. Let's you and me have a date and I'll explain the whole thing." Then as she hesitated, "Aw, c'mon! Be good for my morale. Be good for my family's morale. We'll go see them. They live in Belford. I'll get hold of a car."

Kathryn was intrigued in spite of her better judgment.

"You think if I meet them I'll understand just what it is that makes you so ornery?" she asked.

"The key to my whole personality," he promised.

"When?" She was giving in.

"Saturday night. I'm getting a pass." Suddenly he froze to attention. The door to the adjoining room had opened and the Colonel stood there.

"You may go, Private," he said. And then as Eddy frantically tried to explain it wasn't Kathryn's fault, that he had sneaked in, the Colonel abruptly repeated the order and with a forlorn salute Eddy disappeared out of the window.

"I'm sorry, Dad," Kathryn said.

"Kathryn." His voice was very serious. "The thing I've admired about you most was your ability to be friendly with all the men without showing favoritism."

"But, Dad," she said. "Some of them need more help than the others. Eddy's the only one I've met with low morale. His morale is just awful."

"I don't want to be unreasonable," her father went on. "I think you've been doing a fine job, and I trust your judgment—"

"Then it's okay if I go out with him?" she asked quickly. "I—I sort of made a date with him."

"Of course," he agreed. "It's not in the book but you do whatever you think best. Only," he grinned, "I hope your mother doesn't hear about this. I'm supposed to be taking care of you. If she thought I needed help, she'd come flying out here on the first plane she could get."

Kathryn stared thoughtfully after him. Then she giggled as she tore up the letter she was writing to her mother and began a new one.

"Dear Mom," she wrote, tongue in cheek, "I have fallen in love, madly, desperately in love with a soldier. From now on it's the Army life for me."

There, she thought triumphantly, that should do it. Nothing like strategy to gain your objective, your heart's desire. And she didn't feel the least bit guilty using Eddy either when she met him on Saturday, for he was as arrogant and cocksure of himself as ever, refusing to tell her where they were going.

The gay, brassy music gave her the first clue; then as they turned a corner, she saw the circus grounds and the big tent and as they went inside her eyes widened in wonder. For Kathryn's childhood treats had been matinees at the opera and symphonies and concerts. She'd never known the excitement of spangled bodies whirling through the air, of dancing elephants, of laughing girls pirouetting on horseback, and the tantalizing smell of tanbark.

"It's wonderful, Eddy." She smiled. "Only I thought you were going to take me to your home."

"This is my home," he said.

"Sure." Kathryn grinned mockingly, looking at the audience. "And these are all relatives, huh?"

"No," Eddy said. His eyes were glued to the middle ring, where the star act was about to begin. "They're up there." Then, as Kathryn's eyes followed his to the top of the trapeze, "The one swinging up there is Papa."

Kathryn thought it was one of Eddy's jokes.

"And who is the one hanging upside down?" She grinned.

"Uncle Algy," he said. "And the two girls are my sisters, Marie and Ellen, and there, down below, that's Mother." Then as Kathryn's eyes went towards the middle aged woman who caught the shimmering cloaks the girls threw down to her, posturing as if she'd just performed a difficult trick, Eddy grinned proudly. "How do you like them?"

Kathryn was convinced now.

"They're the most wonderful acrobats I've ever hoped to see," she said.

"Acrobats!" Eddy repeated scornfully. "They're the flying Corbinos. Aerialists!"

"Oh, there's a difference, huh?"

"Sure," he said loftily. "There's even a difference among Aerialists. There's flying acts like this one, and there's double trapeze, swing ladder, iron jaw, that's the kind where the girls hang on with their teeth, then there's one arm and high wire. My folks did the high wire."

"You said they were your folks," Kathryn said gesturing towards the trapeze.

"My real folks were killed when I was four," Eddy said. Then at Kathryn's sympathetic exclamation, "Don't feel bad about it. I never had 'em, never missed 'em. The Corbinos have been swell to me, raised me and trained me."

"Can you do those things?" Kathryn asked completely awed.

Eddy flung her an indignant glance. "Can I do them!" he demanded scornfully. "I was the star of the team. The act used to be known as Eddy Marsh and the Flying Corbinos. You should have seen them when I was with 'em." He took her hand and pulled her to her feet. "Come on. We can beat 'em back. Hurry it up!"

At first glance it would have taken an awful lot of imagination to think of the Corbinos' trailer as a home, with its practice bars and rigging, its dressing tables littered with jars and tubes of greasepaint, its most conspicuous furniture, the five wardrobe trunks cluttering up the floor. But when the Corbinos came in, bringing that gay warmth with them, it was a home all right. It felt good just being there.

"Eddy! Eddy!" They were all talking at once; they were all laughing at once. "Oh, Eddy, you look good. You look fine. How do they treat you, Eddy."

"Wait a minute." Eddy laughed as they crowded around him. "This is Miss Jones. Kathryn Jones." And then as Mama Corbino began pulling out chairs, he shook his head. "We can't stay, Mama, we have to go back to camp."

"Ah, camp!" Papa Corbino shrugged. "They'll wait for you."

"Papa, please," Mama broke in, "Eddy is a very important man in the Army. If he has to get back, he has to get back."

Even Eddy had the grace to blush at this as he glanced at Kathryn. "I'm not as important as all that, Mama," he said.

"Modest, Eddy?" Marie giggled. "You never used to be." She turned to Kathryn. "He used to tell people he was the best flyer on the high traps, and he was!"

"You should have seen our Eddy." Mama Corbino's pride was spilling out of her shining eyes. "You should have seen him do a triple somersault!"

"Ah, Eddy, come back with us." Papa's voice was warm with remembering. "We need you more than the Army."

"First let him win the war," Mama said practically. "He can come back to us later." Then with gay illogic: "Stay for supper, Eddy. No back talk now. In ten minutes we are ready; then we all have supper together."

"Well—" Eddy hesitated, and Kathryn turned to him eagerly.

"Let's," she said. "I'd love it."

Kathryn was entranced with everything, the bountiful supper prepared so effortlessly with everyone helping, the camaraderie that held them all together in that close affection. And it was wonderful when Eddy asked them whether they would do their act for the gala show she was planning and they all said yes at once. Then afterwards, that was wonderful, too, walking over the deserted circus ground, going into the big tent and looking on as Eddy climbed up on the trapeze, as he performed just for her.

"You were a pretty important fellow, weren't you?" she said as he climbed down beside her again. "Is that why you don't like the Army?"

"Well—" there was the old belligerence again—"do you think they've been fair to me?"

"I'm just asking," she said.

"You think I got to the top overnight!" he demanded. "You know how many years I spent working at it? My whole life! And where do they stick me? In the infantry! A man who spent his whole life in the air. And let me tell you something. It takes the same sense of balance and timing to fly a plane as it does to work on the traps. I got a talent! Some people feel happier on the ground and some people—"

Kathryn looked at him thoughtfully. "Maybe I ought to talk to my father about getting you a transfer to the Air Corps," she said.

"Gee!" Eddy put everything he had into the surprised, ingenuous exclamation. "Do you really think so?" And then as if he were giving serious attention to something he'd never as much as thought of before, "Maybe you're right. Maybe that's what you oughta do. Only natural, I guess, for you to understand about all this. You were in show business, yourself, weren't you?"

"Uh-hm." Kathryn nodded. "I used to sing for Iturbi. You know, the symphony conductor."

"Oh, sure," Eddy dismissingly. "The long hair league. One of those hundred piece bands that plays classical. Didn't they drown you out? A hundred pieces play louder than you can sing, don't they?"

"Well, no," Kathryn said. "Not when I'm actually singing."

"Oh, I see." For the first time he looked impressed. "You're the star. When you sing, they all play soft, huh?"

"No, that's not the way it goes at all," she said. "Sometimes they play soft, sometimes loud. We reinforce each other." Then as she saw, he didn't understand at all, "It's like this, suppose there's the orchestra and here's me. The oboes start the overture, softly, then the bassoons come in, the clarinets, then the strings pick it up, the violins and violas. They begin to get louder, the French horns come in, the rest of the brasses—"

Suddenly it was like being back at Carnegie Hall, back with Iturbi and the orchestra. Suddenly she began singing, the song different now from the gay popular tunes she had sung for the boys. Something happened to Eddy, standing there looking at her. Something he'd never thought would ever happen to him, making him forget himself, thinking only of her, feeling that stirring in his heart, that feeling halfway between ecstasy and pain.

And as she sang, there was a stirring outside and the circus people began coming into the tent. The Corbinos and the clowns and the roustabouts and the bareback riders, the lion tamer and the elephant boy, they all came in and stood listening. But Eddy didn't see them. The whole world was there in that circus tent, and he and Kathryn the only people in it, and as the last lovely note faded away, he went over to her and took her in his arms.

There was the applause first to tear them out of that little world of their own, but they couldn't feel embarrassed long with the Corbinos crowding around them their voices raised in happy congratulations. "This is wonderful, Eddy. We didn't know." And then Mama Corbino herself, taking Kathryn in her arms, "We always hoped our Eddy would find a girl like you." And it was funny how right it seemed they should talk like that.

Then at last they were alone again in the small car Eddy had borrowed, but he found he couldn't meet her eyes. He had to put himself straight with her. That's what happened when a man fell in love, he had to put a girl straight about everything.

"Kathryn," he said, abruptly stopping the car. "It wasn't your idea talking to your father about a transfer. It was mine. That's why I took you out." Then as she looked at him in that quick, hurt way, he hurried on, "But I don't want you to think I kissed you because—"

"I don't think that, Eddy," Kathryn said gravely. "It wasn't that kind of a kiss. It was—this kind." And with her arms around him and her lips reaching to his, Eddy knew it was going to be all right, that everything was going to be all right.

You wouldn't have known Eddy after that and after that long talk with the Colonel the next day and the Colonel understanding everything he was trying to say and promising that he would get his transfer. And then when it came, Eddy suddenly realized what it would mean, that transfer. It would mean saying goodbye to Kathryn.

It was going to be awful leaving Kathryn. Her eyes were shining when she met him outside the barracks thrusting a telegram in his hand, a telegram from Iturbi saying he and his orchestra were coming to play in Kathryn's show. That meant Kathryn would be singing and he wouldn't be there to hear her.

"You know somp'n?" he asked with all his old nonchalance. "I'm tearing up my transfer to the Air Force. It came today, and I'm tearing it up."

"But you wanted it so badly," she protested.

"I dunno. I'd rather be with you."

"I'd rather be with you, too." She smiled. And then suddenly Eddy's arms were around her.

"Kathryn, do you want to get married?" he said. "When I get back."

"I—" She looked at him breathlessly. Then she smiled. "It's a date," she said.

"Do you think I will get back?" he asked.

"I'm sure of it," she whispered.

"So am I." He nodded. "So is every guy in the Army."

"You—you'd better go," she said, and it was so silly that with her heart so full of the things she wanted to say to him she could only think of those drab, commonplace words. "You—you know you're on fatigue detail."

"I know." He grinned. "I better go fast." But he didn't make any move to go. He just stood there staring at her. "I love you," he said.

"I love you, too," she said.

She didn't know people really cried when they were happy. She'd always thought that was something poets had made up. But it was true. As she ran back to the house her eyes were misty with tears so that at first she didn't see her mother sitting there on the sofa in the living room until she heard her voice. And then as she looked up Kathryn saw her father standing at the window, his eyes looking at her in that sombre and very intent way.

"Mom." Kathryn found her voice at last. "Oh, Mom, it's good to see you. When did you get here?"

"About an hour ago," Hyllary said. "I got your letter and suspected you need a mother rather quickly."

Kathryn felt as if her heart was riding around on a merry-go-round. She had forgotten all about her strategy, that letter she had sent, in all the excitement of falling in love.

"Your mother wants to take you home," the Colonel said coldly. Then as Kathryn gave that small, protesting cry, Hyllary frowned.

"That's not the way I would have phrased it, Bill," she said sharply.

"No." His smile twisted. "You would have broken her heart gently."

"Your father?" Hyllary ignored her husband's smouldering eyes—"well, he seems rather sympathetic to the boy. Though from what he's told me about him, it's hard to see why."

Kathryn looked up defiantly. "Don't you think you'd better meet him, before you judge him?" she asked.

"No," Hyllary said with quiet finality. "Listen Kitty Kat." Her voice softened. "He's wonderful. He's wonderful or you wouldn't want him. But right now he's in the Army. What kind of life can he give you? His life doesn't even belong to him." She turned abruptly to her husband. "Did you tell her about the Army wives and the gossip and the politics and the sitting around? Did you tell her about having a baby with her husband five thousand miles away?"

"The same old song," the Colonel said bitterly. "The same tune and the same words."

"Kathryn, darling," Hyllary went on as if he hadn't spoken at all. "It's no good. Even if you love him enough not to care where you live, or how you live, it's no good. In fact," her eyes were carefully turned away from the man who had been her husband, "the more you love him the worse it is. The more you love him the more terrified you become that something might happen to him. That's what polite people never mention. That's what you and the boy never talk about."

"We did tonight," Kathryn said.

"Not really," Hyllary said. "Casually perhaps or sentimentally. But it's something you haven't faced. It's something that comes later. You'll try to push it out of your mind, but it won't be in your mind. It will be part of you. It'll be with you night and day. And that's why you're coming home with me now, tomorrow morning, before you find out for yourself."

"No," Kathryn said. "I won't go. You can't make me go. We're having a show Sunday. Movie stars from Hollywood. Iturbi's coming. Eddy asked his folks to set up their trapeze and do their act. All for my show. I don't care what you say. I love him and I'm going to stay with him. Just because you left my father is no reason I—"

"Kathryn," the Colonel said quietly, "I think you'd better let me talk to your mother alone. Do you mind?" He walked over to Hyllary as Kathryn ran from the room. "Would it change your mind if you knew the men were embarking soon?" he said slowly. "This show is very important to them."

Hyllary's voice sounded different. "Are you leaving too, Bill?"

"It's my regiment," he said. They stood looking at each other and for a moment they felt almost close again.

As soon as she saw Eddy's face, Kathryn knew she shouldn't have come to him, that she shouldn't have told him. All the old arrogance came back as without a word he dropped the mop he'd been using on top of a pail and stalked out of the barracks, brushing past the sergeant who tried to stop him, Kathryn couldn't keep up with his long furious stride. He had already gone into the house when she reached it at last.

He walked right over to Hyllary. "Kathryn tells me you want to take her home."

"We've decided to let her stay till after the show," Hyllary said. But her words didn't mollify Eddy at all.

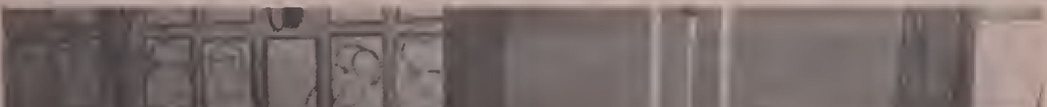
"What gives you the right to decide?" he demanded. "She's over eighteen, isn't she?" He ignored the frantic appeal in Kathryn's eyes as she came into the room. "We're in love. Hasn't she told you?"

"Please, Eddy," Kathryn pleaded. But even Kathryn couldn't reach Eddy when he was in one of his rages.

"You want me to be polite, don't you?" His fury included even her now. "You think she's being polite. She tells you the guy you picked isn't good enough. I'm Eddy Marsh," he said proudly. "I'm no beat up private in the ranks! I'm the guy who—"

"Marsh!" The Colonel called warningly. "Aren't you supposed to be on fatigue tonight?"

"Yes." Two flaming spots on Eddy's cheekbones showed how hard it was for him to be reprimanded. "It wasn't important. Just mopping up the place."



Pleasantest thing about that pleasant little picture "Hi Diddle Diddle" is that it marks the screen return of Pola Negri. You can see here how wonderful she looks. Pola may also go on the radio, which deal is what she's here discussing, seated between (left) C. P. MacGregor, producer of the Hollywood Radio Theatre, and Wynn Rocamora, her agent, at the Brown Derby.

"In the Army every job is important." The Colonel's jaw tightened. "Report to your barracks and have yourself placed in confinement."

Eddy didn't take it easy, being reprimanded like that, as if he were a kid. Being locked up like a criminal. He'd been a sucker going so soft before, trying to be a soldier. Well, he wasn't a sucker anymore, not even for Kathryn. That day she came to the guard house he told her what he thought of an army that slapped a man down just because he spoke his mind, of an army that liked a man better if he was so yellow he kept his mouth shut when everyone shoved him around.

Kathryn wanted to go home after that, but she couldn't when her father reminded her she'd be a quitter running away from her own show. He had been stern with her, much sterner than he had meant to be and he couldn't forget her eyes looking so much younger and bigger than ever with all those unshed tears in them. Maybe he was nothing but an old busybody, he thought as he walked over to the parade grounds where the Corbinos were setting up their trapeze, but when a man has lost out in love himself it's hard to stand by and see his daughter's love smashed, too. And besides he liked Eddy and knew how fine the line is drawn between courage and defiance.

The Corbinos were antagonistic at first when they realized the Colonel was the man who had put their Eddy in jail. Then as he explained why he had to discipline the boy, Uncle Algy shook his head.

"Leaving a post is very bad," he said.

"But why?" Mama Corbino asked in her soft puzzled way. "Why did Eddy do this thing? He is a big man."

"There's one thing Eddy doesn't know about," the Colonel said quietly. "A thing we must have in the Army. Team work."

"But our act is all team work." Marie looked at him in amazement. "Eddy knows that. He must."

"Let's just say he has forgotten it." The Colonel smiled. "Now if you could refresh his memory—" He didn't finish the sentence, he didn't have to with the others smiling like that.

Eddy wasn't turning any hand springs when they let him out of the guard house to do his act. So the Army had found out it needed him after all, had it, he thought bitterly. Shut him up when they didn't want him and then take him out when it did. Oh, he was wise to their tricks all right, he thought as he mounted the ladder to the highest wire and the old arrogance was there in his eyes, the bitterness twisting his mouth as he stood looking down on the audience below.

At first Kathryn's heart had lifted right up into her eyes when she saw him running up the ladder, and then when she saw his face, all the elation was gone. Eddy saw the happiness draining out of her eyes as she looked up at him, but he told himself he didn't care. She was a part of all those things he hated, of the Army, of discipline, of being regimented. For a few minutes anyway he was Eddy Marsh again, Eddy Marsh who didn't need anybody but himself.

He posed for a moment on the platform, adjusting his wrist bandage. Then with an alley oop he was swinging towards Uncle Algy's waiting hands. Then his heart skipped a beat. He had almost missed his grasp.

"Gee," he muttered. "I'm rustier than I thought."

"It's not you," Uncle Algy said. "It's me. I wasn't sure I wanted to catch you." Then as Eddy gave him that quick, are-you-kidding glance, he went on, "Aren't you glad I'm at my post when you need me, Eddy?"

It was the same with all the others. Everytime one of them caught him they reminded him of how much he needed them. Eddy couldn't get it at first. Not until Algy spoke with that new edge to his voice. "Aren't you glad everyone doesn't desert his duty, Eddy?" Then as Eddy didn't answer. "Are you mad?"

Eddy understood things now that they had been translated to his own language. He knew what a quitter he'd been.

"Yes." He ground out the word between his set teeth. "At myself."

Kathryn wasn't at the officers' meeting when Eddy pleaded his own case.

"I'm guilty and I know it and I'm ashamed of it," he said. "Anything you decide to do with me, I can't kick. But I want to say I think I've learned my lesson and not in a guard house either. Not that I got any complaint against the guardhouse," he added quickly. "I'd just rather not go back there. My regiment is leaving, and I want to go with them; I want a chance to be the most important man in the world, a private in the Army of the United States."

Kathryn couldn't hold back her tears when her father told her about it afterwards and that Eddy had been released. She had to see him right away and tell him how proud she was of the way he had taken it. But when she got to the barracks she saw they were deserted and that the army trunk at the end of each cot was gone and all the mattresses rolled up.

She knew what that meant. She whirled around as she heard the sound of marching feet outside, as she saw those long khaki columns marching towards the railroad siding. She ran along side the marching men, until she found Eddy and then she marched beside him, keeping step with him.

"Kathryn," he whispered, his voice shaky with the relief sweeping through him, "I was afraid I wouldn't see you. There's so much to say—"

"Don't say anything, Eddy." She smiled. "Just say you'll come back."

"Got to." Eddy grinned. "There'll be a girl waiting." His hand reached for hers and held it. It only lasted a minute, but it was enough. Kathryn felt as if he were still holding her hand long after he had gone on the train, as she stood there just looking after him.

Then she was conscious of someone else standing beside her. And when she turned she saw her mother and father.

"I'm glad it's time," her father said.

"Yes," Hyllary said and her voice wasn't resentful any more. It sounded wistful and a little lonely. "This is familiar territory, Bill. Our life seems to be made up of farewell scenes."

"But there was something missing in the other ones," he said. "Something like this." He took her in his arms, and as he kissed her Kathryn knew that it wouldn't be too lonely, waiting, not with her mother waiting, too, not with all of them a family again.

WHAT THEY ARE THANKFUL FOR

they are all well; that my young brother is studying to be a comedian at the same school in Paris where I once studied! They had read a story in an English paper that must have been smuggled in, telling about my marriage; they were so relieved and delighted to know that I am happy, and say they know they will love Bill if I do. They have seen pictures of us together and are so pleased that I look so well.

"They say—and this thrills me!—that the morale of Paris is high and they all confidently expect to see me before Christmas. Doesn't that sound as if they expect us to free them by that time? I am so happy! I have prayed and wept for them so long, so very long. I cannot be thankful enough!"

"I realize that fathers must soon go to war," Dana Andrews told me. "I know it's right they should go if needed. I'm sure I'm one of the fortunate fathers to have had success first. I have a wife and two fine children; I've been able to give them a home and provide for them so that I needn't worry over their financial future while I'm away, as so many other fathers must do.

"I'm young enough that I might so easily not have been settled, not have done any of the things I wanted to do, not have reached stardom, but have been floundering around, struggling, despairing, as I was a few years back."

Rosalind Russell's reason for thanksgiving can be put in two words: her son. "I didn't know babies were so remarkable until I had one," she observes.

Irene Manning's husband, Het Manheim, couldn't have a home furlough, but he was stationed with the signal corps in New York City for four whole months, coinciding with Irene's vacation from the screen.

"I'm thankful for that," Irene says. "We took a small apartment in New York, and I kept house. He came home every night, and we were like bride and groom. Because our time was so short—we never knew how long we'd have—we were more considerate of each other. We took time to do things we'd always talked of doing. We didn't waste hours as we usually do on people who don't matter or things we hate doing. It was four months of heaven, more than lots of people ever get out of a lifetime!"

Gracie McDonald, singing star, confides that until she went out on army shows more than a year ago she knew nobody in Hollywood. Now she's fast friends with practically everyone in the industry.

"You start out at nine a.m. with a girl you meet for the first time and that night you share a tent with her. In twelve hours she has become your bosom friend, and the friendship lasts! I've never had so much fun in my life as I've had since I began to do these shows. The men in the service are the finest in the world and I'm proud to meet them."

To Basil Rathbone the fact that he is in this country during this war is grounds for extreme thanksgiving.

"I feel that Great Britain is my mother and America is my wife," he explained. "I could not love one more than the other, for they are different loves. In the other war, I fought for four years as a soldier of Great Britain. They will not take me as a soldier in this war, so if I were in England now I should be doing war work there. I do it here now and I am thankful for it, the scope of my work is far wider than it could be over there, the results much greater."

"I'm thankful I happened to say hello to Steve Trilling, Warners' New York casting director," confesses Robert Alda. "I had met him earlier and might easily have missed him when he passed on Broadway one day. Just in time I remembered and gave him the high sign. If he hadn't looked at me that day, he wouldn't have sent me to the coast. And I'm thankful I arrived when they were looking for someone to play George Gershwin. They selected me.

"We have our first real home, my wife, my son, and I. The boy is seven, and this is the first time since he was born that someone wasn't shushing him. 'Remember the people upstairs!' 'The people below won't like that!' 'No, no, kid—too much noise!' Now he can live as a normal boy should. California is the place to raise a child."

Danny Kaye and his wife have achieved their special pet ambition this year—he is singing the songs she composed for him in his first picture "Up In Arms!" Mrs. Kaye is a professional pianist, and is, he says, the only person who could write his songs.

"The thing that gives me the big kick," Danny asserts, "is that now I'm able to watch myself act and listen to myself sing for the first time!"

THE END

Betty Grable pulled a surprise on the executives of the Third War Loan Drive.

Betty was scheduled to appear at the Long Beach (California) Recreation Park with her husband Harry James. James and his band were playing baseball against the local shipbuilding yard team, and Betty was to auction off her stockings.

So far, so good. Betty pulled off the coveted hose and they went for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Then she reached down into her purse and pulled out a pair of short white angora bobby socks she intended to wear that afternoon.

She said, "This isn't scheduled on the program, but if those other stockings are worth all that money, what about these?"

She got the bidding up to seventy-five thousand dollars, while the Treasury Department boys stood by with open mouths and eager eyes.

Might call it head and foot work, and all for Uncle Sam!

During the weeks that followed Katina and I saw much of each other. Katina's friends for the most part were diplomats connected with the Greek Embassy and had little time to spare. But we were both in the same predicament. We were both foreigners, trying desperately to secure passage to the United States. As a neutral American I was of no use in England those days, and Katina, although she worked twelve hours a day for a relief organization, felt she would be more help to the Greek cause in America where she was slated to appear as "Electra." However, the more we tried, the less success we had in securing passage.

Just at this time the Germans declared war on valiant little Greece. "The devils!" Katina swore. "We would have thrown that army of Italian tenors into the sea if it wasn't for those Huns! Ah, if only I could get to Greece and fight, too."

"Have you much family there?" I asked.

"Everybody," she said. "My mother, my child, my husband, my sisters, and brothers—everybody and everything that belongs to me is in Athens." She impatiently snatched a cigarette. "They are fighting for their very existence, and here I am hiding in a shelter," she continued with disgust.

The next afternoon, after a fruitless morning spent at numerous shipping agencies, Katina saw me in the lobby and rushed to me. "I have finally had success!" she exclaimed, "And what is more, I spoke for you, too."

"Oh, Katina, you don't know how grateful . . ."

"Save all that until you are safely signed on."

"Signed on?"

"Sure. You don't think you can reserve an outside cabin in the center of the boat these days, do you? We are to go as members of the crew. I am a stewardess, and you are to be a steward. The boat in question is a whaler and leaves Scotland tomorrow night for one of the Americas."

"Which one of the Americas?" I asked. "There are several."

Katina scratched her brow. "I was so happy I didn't think to ask. Anyway, what does it matter? Here is the address," she said, giving me a card in her illegible handwriting. "Hurry, now, because we leave for Glasgow tonight."

The following night Katina and I boarded the whaler that was to take us to Curacao in the Dutch West Indies from whence we would have to find some means of transportation to New York.

We joined a large convoy late the next afternoon, and Katina and I settled down to a monotonous and uneventful crossing. Each morning after breakfast we took walks on the large open deck, both of us bundled up to the neck with everything we could find to protect us from the icy winds of the North Atlantic. However, most of the time we remained inside where we played endless games of poker, backgammon, and bridge whenever two of the officers were free at the same time.

Although he treated us like honored guests, the Captain, a big jovial Norwegian, very seldom left his bridge. We saw him only at meals and in the early evening when he descended to his cabin to catch a few minutes of rest. He generously offered us cocktails and choice tid-bits before meals and tried to be a carefree and casual host, but somehow he always looked worried and preoccupied. Katina and I saw no reason for this because in some strange way we both felt that no harm could befall such a large and sturdy ship.

We were soon to learn to the contrary. The fifth night out Katina and I said goodnight as usual and went to our respective cabins. After undressing I found I couldn't sleep. Thinking a change would help, I climbed to the upper berth. I distinctly remember looking at my watch. It was five o'clock in the morning. The steady hum of the engines had lulled me into a half slumber before the first torpedo struck us.

The force of the explosion threw me onto the floor. I dashed down the passageway toward Katina's cabin and flung open the door, thinking I would find her prostrate on the floor. The sight of her sitting calmly on the sofa smoking a cigarette was even more startling.

"We've been torpedoed," I cried.

"Yes, I know," Katina answered, "but an officer just told me to remain here quietly, and that if there is any immediate danger, he would come for me." While she spoke I noticed that the curtains on the window behind her hung almost horizontally because of the list the ship had developed.

"Here," Katina said handing me her tweed sport coat, "you're indecent!"

To my horror I discovered I was stark naked. Just as I struggled into her coat which ended somewhere above my knees, the second torpedo struck us. The ship shuddered from stem to stern.

"To the boats!" an officer shouted from the doorway.

Katina and I rushed to the boat station assigned us the first day out, only to discover that it had been blown to bits. "This way!" another voice called in the dark and I felt a strong arm grab me while Katina and I slid toward the edge. In the semi-obscurity I saw the dark form of a lifeboat swinging from the ship some ten feet below. Further along, another boat had just been lowered and was swept away by the swell only to be carried back by a gigantic wave and smashed against the steel hull of the ship amidst the screams of its doomed occupants.

"Jump!" the first officer ordered, and a hand pushed us toward the edge. I saw Katina's white-clad form hurtling through space. Then I jumped.

Neither of us moved after we landed on the bottom of the lifeboat. It was bouncing dangerously over the angry white-capped sea and fearfully we waited to be carried back, like the other boat, and be likewise smashed to splinters. But after agonizing seconds we relaxed. We opened our eyes and saw that we were already hundreds of yards from the rapidly sinking ship. There we were, twelve shivering forms huddled in a tiny bark, floating aimlessly in the North Atlantic, and we feared that none of us might survive.

It was only then that I realized that it was the month of March and that I was clothed uniquely in Katina's tweed coat. Katina was no better off—over her nightdress she was wearing my camel hair coat which I had left in her cabin the previous afternoon. To this day I shudder to think of all her beautiful furs lying at the bottom of the ocean. I remember mentioning this to her when we were rescued by a British destroyer some eighteen hours later. She pointed to a small valise which had never left her side. "The coats are nothing," she said, "as long as I have this."

"Oh, your jewels," I remarked.

"Jewels?" Katina laughed and opened the valise. To my astonishment the small bag contained nothing but press clippings. "These are my jewels," she said. "In America where I am unknown, these will be worth more than emeralds to me."

When we boarded the destroyer, we were more dead than alive. Everyone was suffering from the intense cold, but after a generous portion of rum and a hearty breakfast we began to feel at least a little human. Katina was the only woman aboard, and the Commander generously offered her his quarters.

"I wouldn't dream of putting you to such inconvenience," Katina protested.

"It isn't an inconvenience," the Commander assured her. "In any event, while we are in these dangerous waters I always bunk on the bridge."

One of the officers told me I could have the upper in his cabin, and, after a warm shower and shave, I put on the dungarees which he had given me and went in search of Katina. I found her dressed like myself in dungarees, calmly sitting in the cabin, smoking as usual. There was no ash tray, and her eyes fell upon the depth charge which protruded from under the bed table. "What a strange room mate," Katina remarked as she crushed her cigarette on the depth charge. "The Commander must have a weird sense of humor to keep this dummy in his cabin."

Just then a siren went off, and hell broke loose as the ship's guns took up the challenge. We could hear bombs dropping all around us as we sat helpless in our iron cage. We chain-smoked in silence for the better part of half an hour when the shattering din ceased as suddenly as it had begun. Perfectly timed with the order to cease firing, an officer reappeared at the door. Saluting Katina, he informed her with the Commander's compliments that the raid was over. Katina and I unbelievingly looked at each other.

"The English," she said, "even at a time like this, they can still remember their manners."

Other than this, they told us nothing. At lunch the alarm went off once more. We sneaked up on deck this time and watched the battle. Three planes were attacking us, but after a few near misses, were driven off. Relieved, we started on a tour of inspection. To our horror we discovered that there was not one lifeboat aboard. We quickly informed the officer with us about this stupid oversight.

"What use would they be?" he smiled. "If a torpedo or a bomb hits us, we won't need any lifeboats. You see," he added, "the hull of this ship is loaded like an arsenal."

Later that day a submarine was sighted and, fascinatedly, we watched the depth charges flying into the sky; then, as an appetizer, we had another little air raid before dinner.

It was after this meal that Katina became the mascot of the ship. There was a small piano in the lounge, and when they heard that she could play, the chief gunner and ship baritone handed her the music of the "Lambeth Walk." We had quite a concert, and then after a game of darts it was time for bed.

Every day was much the same during our stay aboard the destroyer—air raids, submarine attacks, concerts and darts, and the added attraction of Katina cooking dinner the last days out. When a week later the destroyer docked in the tiny Scottish port of Gourock, we almost regretted to leave. The crew was on deck to see us off as Katina limped to the gangplank.

"What has happened?" the Commander asked with concern.

"Oh, it's that dud you keep in your cabin," Katina said. "I was always bumping into it."

"A dud?" he snorted. "The ship's papers and code books are in my cabin, and that dud as you call it is very much alive. In fact, it is the only one on board that is constantly timed to explode!"

WHEN we reached London, Katina and I started out to replenish our wardrobes. I was gone all afternoon at a tailor's, but when I got back to the hotel, the clerk told me that Katina wanted to see me the moment I got in. I found her beside herself with agitation. "Please," she informed me, "call all your girl friends and see if you can get me something to wear. I've just been summoned to Buckingham Palace."

I appreciated her predicament and started out at once to assemble an outfit. A dear friend of mine and fan of Katina's came to the rescue. The dress she brought was very smart, but as she was on the stout side we had to pull the dress tightly in front and sew it up the back. It's hopeless, I thought, when I stood back and surveyed the thick tuck down Katina's spine. However, I should have known better than to think a little thing like a tuck would floor Katina. My friend saw her eyeing the mink coat she was wearing and understood instantly.

"I needn't take it off," Katina beamed as she looked at herself in the becoming fur. "Now, if I don't rip it down the back when I curtsy, all's well."

Katina was gone all afternoon and it was after six when she burst into the room. "We're leaving for Lisbon at the end of the week!" she exclaimed.

It took ten minutes before I could calm her down sufficiently to force an explanation from her. "The Duchess of Kent," she began, "wanted to hear all the details of my miraculous escape, but when I finished by telling her that I was trying to get another job as stewardess in order to reach America, she wouldn't hear of it. I told her about you, too, and now we have two tickets for the Clipper."

Of course, I was so elated by this good news that it was some time before I noticed the change in Katina's appearance. "Where did you get . . ."

"Oh, the dress," Katina said guiltily, "you see, since the Duchess and I are the same size she insisted . . ."

WE dined with friends the last night of our stay in London, and in our joy to be off the first thing in the morning we were oblivious of the hotel rocking under us. Suddenly a land mine exploded on the embankment in front of the hotel, but since we were dining in the Grill we were only jostled by the explosion. We resumed our dinner, and it was only when we said good night and started for our rooms that we were told they no longer existed. We spent our last night in the lobby. The next morning with the little valise containing Katina's press clippings which we had managed to salvage from the wreckage as our only luggage, we left for the station.

That afternoon we reached Lisbon. As we possessed only the ten pounds allowed us when we left England, we stopped at a modest hotel so that our money would last the several days we had to wait for the Clipper. As a further economy we gladly accepted the invitation to dine with the Greek Ambassador. At the hour of our appointment, I descended to the bar.

I was surprised to see Katina, the Ambassador and his wife sitting forlornly at a corner. They all looked as if they had been crying, and I inquired what had happened. His Excellency was the first to find his voice: "The Germans invaded Athens this morning."

"Poor little Greece," I sighed, "conquered at last."

At the word "conquered," Katina sat upright in her chair. "Invaded!" she corrected me, "not conquered."

We drove to the Casino at Estoril in silence. None of us was hungry, but since the Ambassador had invited friends to join us there, it was impossible to put them off. The conversation throughout the meal was centered on German atrocities and the ridiculous Italians, who, at the heels of their masters, were marching victoriously into the city which had given birth to civilization.

I saw Katina wince when she heard a passing couple glibly conversing in German and later when she got up, I followed her into the gambling rooms. She spotted a large, well fed German woman sitting at a table of Chemin-de-Fer. Katina saw the pile of chips in front of the woman, and suddenly turned to me with her eyes ablaze. As I had her ten pounds as well as my own, she put out her hand. "Give," she commanded.

"But, Katina . . ."

"Give!" she insisted. "If it's the last thing I do, I'll send that German —— home penniless."

Before I could advance a further argument she turned to the woman who was waiting confidently for someone to call her bank. "Banco!" Katina called, and the woman dealt her two cards. I held my breath as Katina threw down a nine. Although the bank was not large, had we lost, it would have been desperate. Katina reached for the chips and sat down opposite the woman who looked at her as if to say, "I'll get you next time."

Although there were seven other players, the German woman ignored them and concentrated on Katina. When it came Katina's turn to hold the bank, the grosse frau called banco before Katina had a chance to mount her bet. At this, Katina put all her chips on the table and topped them with the two English ten pound notes. The woman sneered when she saw the English money and defiantly repeated the word "Banco."

Then as Katina began to deal the cards, my nerves got the better of me and I hastened to the bar. When I finished my second brandy and soda, and Katina still hadn't come to fetch me, I returned to the table with my heart in my mouth. I stumbled giddily when I saw the pile of chips in front of the radiant Katina.

"Come," I implored her, "don't tempt fate any further."

"She still has two chips," Katina answered and called the woman's bank. The latter placed an eight on the table and a somewhat pale Katina glanced at her cards. "Nine!" she shouted triumphantly and then glared at the woman. The latter searched nervously in her bag, but finding it empty, rose from the table.

For the remainder of our stay, Katina was busy spending her winnings, and when she boarded the Clipper she had a large valise full of new clothes. Thirty-six hours later, a happy and determined Katina arrived at La Guardia field in New York City with exactly thirty-eight cents in her pocket.

Morris Gest, the producer, was waiting for her as she stepped from the plane, and in the cab on the way to the hotel he described at length his plans for producing "Electra." I left for California the following week. When I reached Hollywood, I read of the sudden death of Morris Gest. This brought to an end Katina's hopes of making her American debut in her favorite role.

The future was gray for Katina. She had no money and very few friends who were in a position to help her. What a pity, I thought, that such a great artist should be forced to seek some obscure employment in order to live.

But again I was forgetting Katina's tenacity. There are people who can meet failure face to face and still refuse to see it—people who know their own value and regardless of the setbacks they encounter, redouble their stride, and march with ever increasing energy toward their goal. Katina is one of these people.

Alone, friendless, in a strange city and with a capital of thirty-eight cents, how did Katina Paxinou manage to live at one of the city's most luxurious hotels? How was her husband able to escape the Nazis after four attempts and get to his wife's side—only to be as broke as she? How did the unknown Paxinou get the role of Pilar? Find the answer to these questions in the next installment of Terence Kennedy's exciting story in the January MOVIELAND.

HAYWORTH-WELLES MARRIAGE

—their first pairing in the news struck sparks of interest, and we might say protest.

Movieland told you several months ago about the first coupling of their names. This was an item in Sidney Skolsky's column in which Orson said he wanted to meet Rita. One night at Lucey's, a small restaurant across from Paramount, he did meet her. They dined and they talked. They were seen together frequently after that. Yet it was a long time before people began taking their dating seriously.

First, absolutely nobody had thought of these particular two people "getting around to each other" as the Hollywood saying goes, and so it just didn't seem "right." (As a matter of truth, there are probably no two individuals we know who are right-er for each other—a point we hope to make clear later in the story.)

Second, there was the fact that the newspaper ink had barely dried on Rita's announcement of her intention to wed Victor Mature, a romance which in itself had been as fraught with shoals as the unquiet seas Victor now sails with the U.S. Coast Guards. Orson, who makes headlines like other people make conversation, was not too far removed from a long-standing romance with Dolores del Rio, had publicly expressed a yen to become better acquainted with Hedy Lamarr, and had otherwise acquired himself a reputation as a collector of beautiful things to wear on his arm.

There was every reason to believe that nothing permanent could develop from this casual first-dating—which made it a sure bet that something would. If there was one bit of compatability this love had to build on, it was the happy faculty possessed by both Orson and Rita for following the line of most resistance. Columnists shoved their typewriters into second gear to be ready for the take-off.

Followed, in quick succession, (1) an announcement by Orson that his object was not love but legerdemain, and a protest from Columbia Studios against the star of their current extravaganza, "Cover Girl," taking time off from her beauty sleep to be sawed in half each night at Orson's tent show, and (2) a mid-ocean phone call from Mature, challenging Rita to break off either her engagement to him, or her appearances (private and professional) with Welles.

Although, in the case of Victor, there is naturally much sympathy, it is a fact that both he and Columbia should have known better. Orson's most triumphant trick on the opening night of his magic show was pulling the heavenly Hayworth from his hat. It was a feat topped only by (3) his marriage to her a little over a month after that first dinner date.

Just what precipitated the marital bombshell—and it was literally that to all those Hollywoodians who pride themselves on being a hop ahead of the news—is not clearly known. The release of virile Vic from sea duty for a bond-selling tour, may have built a fire under Orson's intentions. On the other hand, a close confidante of Rita's quotes her as having said, some days before, that she was praying for a Welles proposal and had a quick "Yes" ready when it came.

There is also a possibility that the two who had dreamed and worked together to bring Hollywood's first privately financed and executed free-entertainment to service men, had gained a little by that experience. Could be that working with the art of illusion, they learned to recognize and appreciate real magic when it happened to them.

For most people, September 7th dawned just like any other day. On that particular mid-morning, however, the six-foot figure of Orson the Magnificent was noted standing on a Beverly Hills corner in what might be likened to a daze. At least he seemed not to be going anywhere, doing anything, and to all appearances was even oblivious to the passers-by. Since it is well known that this twenty-seven-year-old genius has been going places and doing things since the day he stepped out of his crib, and moreover, that any collection of more than two people is considered by him to be an audience, this public inertia was in itself enough to cause comment.

Word got around that in addition to the imminent surrender of Italy, other things were brewing. Not until some hours later did it become known that it was not coma, but the confusion suffered by most young men on their way to buy a wedding ring. For the statisticians, the ring was a plain gold, triple band circlet and cost thirty dollars. "A temporary ring," as he afterward described it.

On that same morning, the star of "Cover Girl" reported to her set as usual. She made her usual appointment at the studio hair-dressers, donned her screen make-up, and faced the cameras with no undue excitement. The excitement came along about lunch-time when she stopped in at the front office to inform Columbia prexy Harry Cohn that she was taking a few hours off that afternoon to run over to Santa Monica and get married.

Although "quiet" marriages, elopements, and the like are not unknown in the film colony, the stage is usually pretty well set beforehand. But here was a glamor girl who said she wanted no fuss, and evidently meant it. Unfortunately for glamor girls, however, their lives are not their own. In the future, many a press and publicity department ulcer will be traced back to the three hours of panic which ensued between lunchtime and three o'clock of the Hayworth-Welles wedding day.

After hurried inquiries of every license bureau in Southern California, the possibility that Miss Hayworth meant Santa Monica when she said "Santa Monica" was gradually accepted. After a clue-chase that would do credit to the FBI, a perspiring troop of photographers, press representatives, and publicists, literally burst into the quiet offices of one Judge Orlando H. Rhodes who, under pressure, admitted he had a wedding ceremony scheduled for four-thirty that afternoon.

The Judge, an affable, dignified fellow, had no idea who the prospective bride and groom might be. A friend of his, attorney Lloyd Wright, had phoned and asked him to stand by to perform a marriage. Lawyer Wright has many clients among movie folk. The publicists were convinced they had guessed correctly.

"I hope you are not disappointed," said the Judge in some confusion as the determined press stampeded him into a corner of his private office and took over his reception room and telephones. For avid movie fans, it is recorded that some time later the jurist called a publicist to one side and diffidently asked, "Would you mind telling me a little about these people you are expecting? I don't read the columns much—just who are they, this Rita Hayworth and Orson Welles?"

Closing hour for the twelfth floor license bureau was set at four-thirty. At four-twenty, there was no one at the license counter except an unknown soldier and his trembling bride. With eight minutes to go—with photographers covering the front entrance, the elevators and two floors of the Bay City building, word finally passed along the grapevine that THE wedding party was on its way up.

The party consisted of the two principals, actor Joe Cotten who expected to act as best man, Dr. and Mrs. Bernstein, guardian and foster parents of Welles, and Jackson Leightner, Orson's business manager.

Rita wore a suit and large hat of a shade called "burnt toast" although almost a perfect match for her lovely, flaming hair, which is of a shade called titian. It was an ensemble she has had in her wardrobe for some time—she wore no flowers, because in the excitement, no one had remembered a wedding corsage. Orson was clad in a familiar pin-stripe suit, black bow-tie, a shirt of the pink known as "Shocking," and a heavy bead of perspiration on his brow. It may be noted, too, that since no important event of his life has found the ruggedly individual Mr. Welles ready and waiting with a hair-cut, his leonine mane was worn as usual, covering his neck almost to his collar.

The one festively-clad personage was Mr. Cotten, sporting a dapper gray suit with boutonniere and pearl gray gloves. Cotten, currently filming "Gaslight" with Ingrid Bergman at Metro, was obviously pleased with himself.

"Don't tell me I wasn't smart to take the afternoon off," said he. "I had a hunch something was cooking!"

Cotten's appearance was paid appropriate tribute later, when Orson got around to it.

"Somehow or other, this is going to wind up with you and Rita walking out the front door and being pelted with flowers," said the groom, giving a hitch to his own drooping bow-tie.

Have you ever applied for a marriage license eight minutes before closing time, a battery of flash-bulbs exploding in your face, a bevy of pressmen leaning over your shoulder to witness your signature? "George Orson Welles" wrote the groom shakily, and "Marguerita Judson" appended the bride, with a blot in lieu of a period.

"I know why you have to go through this," muttered the tortured Welles into his collar. "If you can take it, you can stand anything. I'm waiting for the part where they turn out the lights and start beating you over the head with rubber hoses—"

In a strictly clinical tone, the lady license clerk made observation that for a couple with a previous marriage apiece to their credit, this was the most nervous couple she had ever seen. Her remark was given substantiation a second later when Orson snatched Rita's hand and the application blank, and tore for the elevator. It took some persuasion to convince him the application was not a certificate, and that he was not yet ready to be married.

In the judge's chambers, the wedding of the young man who is generally acknowledged to be the most astounding showman of his decade, also missed most of its cues. Undoubtedly scheduled to be performed in some privacy, the ceremony took place in a small office crowded to the doors with press and publicists, with photographers standing on chairs and actually hanging from the chandelier.

There was a lot of laughing and shoving and shutter-clicking, and someone had just made a remark about "when do we do a dissolve into the Judge's office?" and Orson had just replied, "Right after the part where Eugene Pallette enters in the irate father role—" Then, all of a sudden, there was the Judge standing across a desk from a couple of the most famous people in the world, and asking them a question that had nothing to do with show business or ballyhoo or glamour.

"Here in this company," intoned a solemn voice, "is it your desire to become man and wife?"

And here in this company, some of them strangers and all of them unsentimental until this moment, there came that hush which always comes in the face of something real in the lives of people, great or small.

"Do you, Orson, take this woman—?" "Do you, Marguerita, take this man—" "For richer for poorer—in sickness or in health—do you promise to love and to cherish—" Here in this company, two voices that have been heard around the world, trembled, and were almost inaudible as they said their "I do's."

The best "shots" of the Hayworth-Welles wedding were never taken. They might have included that awkward moment when Orson's fumbling fingers couldn't seem to tear the new wedding ring from its tissue paper wrappings, and that very human moment when Rita's slender shoulders shook so the Judge found it necessary to ask the man she was marrying to hold both of her slim hands within his own to ease her trembling.

The pictures weren't taken simply because not one of the rightfully labeled "hard boiled" photogs present could bring himself to click a shutter. Not a flash-bulb exploded, either, during that long breathless silence when Rita and Orson stood clasped in their first wedded kiss. This was a moment which had nothing to do with acting, and somehow, everyone in the room knew it.

There were re-takes on the kiss a minute afterwards, when a photog said, "Look this way, please, Mrs. Welles," and like every other bride, the movie star failed to recognize her new name. This is the place, too, to observe that best-man Joe Cotten was "standing up" with a newspaperman all during the ceremony, and not until he was wanted for photographing was he allowed to push his way to the side of the groom!

Doctor and Mrs. Bernstein, also, were crowded out of their rightful place during the proceedings, but the foster parents of Welles were probably the only two persons who stayed entirely unruffled during the whole hectic half-hour. Like most "dads" the doctor was heard to observe that he wasn't a bit surprised, "knew it all the time." Mrs. Bernstein was holding tightly to a small gift-wrapped package, the only wedding present in sight.

The gift was a pair of very old Spanish earrings, diamonds and emeralds set in antique gold, once the property of the legended Borgias.

"They were given to me by Lucretia Bori, who traces her ancestry to the Borgias," said Mrs. Bernstein. "I want the loveliest Spanish girl I have ever known—Rita—to have them."

Her explanation was interrupted by a cameraman who pushed past calling for "One last shot, Orson!"

"Okay, fellow," said the groom, "but this is it!"

"All right, come upstage a little please, Mrs. Welles—"

"'Upstage,'" groaned the groom. "I'm sorry, darling, really I am—"

"I don't care—" And judging from the radiant Hayworth expression, she really didn't.

As the newspapers quipped, the "honeymoon" was spent in the elevator leaving the Bay City building. "Are you going away?" Welles was asked. "Are you kidding?" he retorted, and headed back to Hollywood.

Rita reported for make-up at the studio next morning at six-thirty at which time she was greeted by a male star.

"Rita, darling," said he, kissing her in congratulation, "what are you doing here today? This is one day that should belong to you and Orson—"

"It doesn't matter," said the bride dreamily, "we'll have such a long, long time—"

Betting on a Hollywood marriage is gambling to the point of frenzy. We wouldn't plunge on the permanency of any Film Town twosome, especially on two such mercurial personalities as the new Mr. and Mrs. Welles. Where this particular pair is concerned, however, we wouldn't bet against it.

Of entirely opposite dispositions, they still have much in common. They have youth, but it is youth tempered with experience. Sudden fame or riches can hardly upset this couple, since both have already had a full measure of each. Each is alive with a variety of talents, there can't be much quarreling over that spotlight which both know so well how to attract and to hold.

Considering the purely human equation, these two have much to offer each other.

Orson is a bitterly brilliant young man, erratic and possessed of a great restlessness. His ego could never be satisfied with anything but a lovely and talented wife. Rita, for all her flashing beauty, is one of the simplest, most unspoiled, placidly sweet personalities in all of Hollywood. In old-fashioned verbiage, she is decidedly the "clinging vine" type, needing a dominating male to give her life purpose and direction. The qualities of one should counter-balance and fulfill the needs of the other.

BETTING ON CHAPMAN

titled "My Kingdom for a Cook."

Director William Seiter is definitely the fellow who stepped into young Miss Chapman's life and stopped Fate from using her like a yo-yo. Assigned to bring "Destroyer" safely to port, he wanted a leading woman who looked as though she could hold the affections of Edw. G. Robinson (Paternal) and Glenn Ford (eternal). He reached into the "B" file and pulled Maggie out.

While "Destroyer" provided her with two topnotch leading men, it also provided her with the strongest competition a feminine player ever runs into—the over-powering allure exerted upon men and audiences by a plunging ship on a seething sea. Nevertheless, Maggie managed to make so many of the film's moments entirely her own, the studio immediately rewarded her with one of the best dramatic roles of the year, the lead opposite George Sanders in "Appointment in Berlin."

For many a twenty-three-year-old actress this would have been murder, but for Chapman it was the beginning of a new life. Any young player, who, in a single role, can successfully cope with a Sanders performance, an assumed accent, and a death scene (any one of which is sufficient to show up the "ham" if it is there), is well on her way to stardom.

The first two pictures were made in six months, and Marguerite would have liked a vacation when they were over. She was tired . . . but as far as the studio was concerned, she was too hot a bet to be allowed to cool off. According to their long-range planning, by the time "Destroyer" and "Appointment in Berlin" were released, Maggie would definitely be big-time stuff. There would have to be a third picture ready and waiting, for the follow-up.

Betting on people is much riskier than, say, betting on horses. People can do a dozen more things to prove you're wrong than a horse which can only bolt the track, finish last, or maybe sit down and refuse to run. People—and movie stars are people in spite of a lot of public opinion to the contrary—are the greatest gamble in the world. Yet Marguerite was far from being a longshot when her studio decided she was worth an "A" picture plunge.

To begin with, there was her beauty—an asset not uncommon in Hollywood, although the quality of it is. If you bumped head on into the little Chapman on the boulevard, you'd probably think she was one of the prettiest girls you'd ever seen, but there is nothing to signal to you from across the street that she is an "actress."

It was the particular quality of her loveliness that delayed her start in Hollywood. Unlike the majority of the little girls who get big chances out here, she looks neither like a Petty drawing, and Oh-Mama doll, nor a composite of six other screen glamor gals. The movie town didn't know just how to type her.

Unbleached brown hair, wide-set blue eyes, the kind of eyebrows, nose, and mouth you wouldn't believe if

LETTER FROM A BOY IN THE SERVICE

$5.00 LETTER

Since you would like to have someone write about Hollywood, I can say something about that lovely place and everything that goes with it.

I went to Hollywood on my seven-day furlough and had the most glorious week of my life. I had the pleasure of meeting one of the loveliest persons I have ever come in contact with—Betty Grable. I also met and took pictures of three of the Warner Bros. girls at the Beverly Hills Hotel pool. They were Miss Joyce Reynolds, who is as darling and sweet as they come, Miss Julie Bishop, and Miss Eleanor Parker.

Others I met are Lana Turner, Janet Blair, Joan Leslie, Nancy Coleman, Anne Shirley, Anne Gwynne, Katherine Booth, Florence Lake, Bob Hope, Robert Young, Allan Jones, Paul Henreid, and Laird Cregar. I assure you that to meet these people is to know how wonderful they really are. They didn't seem like actors—rather like people I've known all my life.

I come from New York, where the people are hospitable, but no one anywhere can be as hospitable as the people in Hollywood.

When I was in New York on May 15th, I did a broadcast with Paula Stone about my trip to Hollywood, and was thrilled by it.

I don't know whether this will win a prize, but I assure you that it was a privilege and a pleasure to write and tell about my experiences in Hollywood. I neglected to mention that several stars write me. I receive mail from Olivia de Havilland, Joan Leslie, Nancy Coleman, and last but not least, a person who is going to be very big shortly and who has a heart like a mother, God bless her—Joyce Reynolds.

an artist had painted them—photogenically she is perfect, but her features are much more than classic. They are also alive. Out of this facile set-up looks humor and intelligence, a lot of spunk and a little temper—all of them things that don't always make a screen star, but definitely make an actress. (Notice we've dropped the quotes.)

To understand all of the things that look out of Marguerite's face you'd have to go way back to the very beginning of her twenty-three years, to Chatham, N. Y., where she was born to be the kid sister of four husky males.

"I spent the early part of my life being a victim," she says, using some of the humor the experience gave her. "Any girl who lives through a childhood tagging along after four brothers learns at least three things—how to dodge, how to bounce, and how to laugh!"

There are other things that contributed to the character and intensity she brought along with her when she started out after a screen career. The Chapmans were a medium-circumstanced family. Marguerite took her first job, watching babies, at the age of eight, to earn a pair of red slippers she wanted very much. She worked her way through high-school doing extra typing at thirty-five cents an hour for the school superintendent. She quit only because the superintendent's wife was suddenly taken with operatic aspirations and insisted on making the daily painful ascent to high C right next door to where Marguerite was trying to concentrate on her typing.

By the time she was eighteen, she had worked at a dozen different jobs, each a little better paying than the last. She operated a switchboard, worked as a dental assistant and made hats to earn money enough to pay tuition on a New York modeling school course.

Skipping the school's not too promising leads, she headed straight for the mecca of models, John Powers' office. Going up in the same elevator with her was a young man whose eyes had made a sort of Cook's tour of her face and figure, stopping off at all the right places, by the time they reached her floor. He turned out to be Powers himself, and before the afternoon was ended Maggie had five modeling appointments.

This was positively one of the "up" periods in Chapman's life. She started out on her first assignment with a dollar and eighty-two cents in her purse and in no time at all was carting several hundred dollars to the bank every week. She was pitching some beautiful curves in all the very best magazines when a Howard Hughes talent scout saw her. "You ought to be in movies" was a moth-eaten crack, but she believed him.

The first bump she took in on the West Coast was the one she sustained in the tumble down the stairs of movie mogul Jack Warner's home, when the thin spike of her heel caught in the tulle spray of her best party dress.

"Whose feet did you land at?" we asked.

"At Errol Flynn's—but maybe you hadn't better say that. Just state that practically nobody missed my entrance!"

It was at this party, later in the evening, that Marguerite noticed something very strange about Hollywood males. She didn't know, at the time, how important a "name" was.

"Whenever someone took me over to a man and said 'I want you to meet Marguerite Chapman,' it seemed to have the oddest effect. The man would just mumble something coldly polite, and never raise his eyes from his cocktail glass.

"I was beginning to get a complex. I thought maybe I just wasn't worth looking at—and then I was introduced to Charles Boyer. He was the first man in the whole crowd who stood up and looked me full in the face and smiled. He was gracious enough to say, 'This is a pleasure, Miss Chapman'—and acted as if he meant it.

"It was a simple thing, but it did wonders for my sagging ego. I'll always be grateful to Mr. Boyer for that amount of kindness."

One other incident helped her decide to stick it out. The "Outlaw" role went to voluptuous Jane Russell, but Marguerite's test brought her an acting job at 20th Century-Fox. The first day on the lot she was allowed to use, as a temporary measure, a star's portable dressing room. The makeup of the other actress was spread out on a towel on the table. Wanting to look professional, Marguerite spread out a towel on the same table, carefully placing her make-up articles in the same order.

The star, returning to the dressing room, took one look and swept the little bit player's articles to the floor in a rage. "Don't ever do that again!" she said, without further explanation.

"I didn't know about class distinction," Maggie recalls. "Where I had come from, the 'big shot' models were the first to help a beginner. I'd helped many a newcomer fix her hair, and fix her lips, so they'd photograph right. I made up my mind I'd be a bigtime screen player some day just so I could be kind to a little one!"

Nice things happened to the newcomer, of course, but things had a way of looking bright, then clouding up again. The day Fox dropped her option, she was in bed with a strep throat. She won the second lead in an RKO picture, "A Guy, a Gal and a Gob," and did a good job of it . . . but opportunity languished again. She was in and out of debt so often, she began to feel like a revolving door.

The "Navy Blues Sextette" job at Warners' gave her experience—both good and bad. A nine months' personal appearance tour taught her poise and how to meet people in the mass . . . but after she was back, and the studio had terminated her contract along with the six other beauties, she found out just how hard it is to live down the "chorus cutie" stigma at the casting office.

Luckily, a test made for Columbia sometime before "Navy Blues" resulted in a contract, which is now a year old. During that year, Maggie accomplished the almost impossible: she began in "B" pictures and advanced to "A" productions. The reverse has happened a tragic number of times in Hollywood, but the "B" to "A" routine develops very seldom. Also in that year, Maggie became the only one of the Navy Blues Sextette who has attained leading roles in major pictures.

Anytime you're an "only" in the picture business, you're a success.

THE END

Beery vehicles—the Mack Sennett comedies, for instance, "Min and Bill," "The Big House," "The Champ"—are still earning money! It doesn't seem fantastic, now—indeed it appears conservative and reasonable (if you count in Broadway starring vehicles)—to estimate that Beery "works" have grossed five hundred million dollars.

Half a billion dollars! It's a hard idea to grasp. Put it this way. You always think of Bing Crosby and Charlie Chaplin as among the greatest all-time money earners. You could roll all earnings of the Crosby pictures and the Chaplin pictures together, subtract them from the earnings of Beery "works," and have a comfortable margin left over. Or . . . go classic a minute. Suppose you were able to take from museums all the paintings of Leonardo da Vinci and Raphael, two of the greatest painters, and put those combined paintings on sale. They have had the benefit of centuries of publicity, of millions of reproductions, of agreement by mankind on their essential greatness. Those paintings might—they might, mind you—gross five hundred million dollars.

What does it mean? I never heard but one critic refer to a Beery picture as "Art." That critic is head of one of the finest University English Departments in America—never mind which, I don't want to get the man fired. He considers that Frances Marion's screenplay, "The Champ," "ranks with Shakespeare," and that "The Champ," as played on the screen by Wally and Jackie Cooper, "equals in dramatic value the finest Shakespeare presentations of our time."

We know this about the pictures business—you're supposed to last in it, as a top star, about five years. Exceptions are few. So—hold your breath—Wally has been a top movie star thirty-seven years. What has the man got? What's inside?

The camera role most played by Beery is The Roughneck With A Heart Of Gold. They don't call the picture that, but Wally has played it, in one form or another, too often to count up. It has become a commonplace to say, "Oh, Wally—he's just playing himself!" Is any human being that uncomplicated? Are we all so simple, like a photograph where harsh lighting has turned everything into shiny black and sharp white?

There'll be shadings in Wally's character, for any new wife to find, and . . . it should be said in justice to the man . . . one of them will be the Heart of Gold. Beery proved it, beyond doubt, by his behavior in 1938, at the time of his break-up with Rita Gilman. As at the time of his first marriage, to Gloria Swanson, Wally was, when he married Rita, one of the screen's top actors. It was 1924, and he had just played King Richard in the Douglas Fairbanks version of "Robin Hood," played it so convincingly that many critics said the characterization had stolen the show. Be that as it may—Fairbanks never appeared on the screen again with Wally.

Rita played a small role in that Robin Hood movie. She was more than pretty—bright and attractive—and Wally, drawn by her sunny nature and her obvious admiration of the big, kindly guy playing Richard the Lionheart, tried matrimony the second time. For fourteen years, it looked like a deal. The pair adopted, in 1931, the nine-months-old Carole Ann, who became an idol in Beery's sentimental heart.

In 1938, black, dismal disappointment struck.

Rita announced:

"Wally, I want my freedom."

The big man took this second tragedy in his life very quietly. First he said, without hesitation, "Certainly, Rita. Whatever you want is what I want." However, when Rita later contemplated a second marriage, Wally worried for fear it would prove unhappy.

"I don't like this guy," Wally told himself. "I just don't like him." It wasn't jealousy—believe that; it was a fierce, deep-seated hunch on Wally's part that the man (his name doesn't matter in this story) wouldn't make Rita happy. Wally is a cop's son and a realist. He hired more detectives to trace the man's early life than the G-men would need to investigate Nazi spy No. 1. If Rita's intended ever stooped to tie his shoelace in Detroit twelve years before, you can be sure Wally found out about it. Wally's detectives discovered no jail sentence anywhere against the man—not even an indictment. They did secure records of a few instances where police had questioned the gentleman at length. But that doesn't mean crime. Many men have been questioned, who were innocent.

Financial arrangements were generous. Rita thought one hundred thousand dollars would be right as a settlement. Wally gave it to her . . . in an irrevocable trust fund that could never be touched by anyone but her. Then he added fifteen thousand dollars cash for a wedding present. Rita thought a home was only fair. Wally gave her one—free of strings—and another, tied up in an irrevocable trust!

Most generous act of all, Wally agreed that Rita should share with him the beloved Carole Ann—six months out of each year with Rita, six months with Wally.

The ex-Mrs. Beery's new marriage went on the rocks, almost at once, as Wally anticipated. The money went, too. She still has the one hundred thousand that Wally put in trust for her, and the house that was also in trust. To the few writers who get close enough to Beery to relate his life with any authority, he says, "Go lightly on Rita. She's had her troubles, too."

So much for The Heart of Gold. There's another quality in Wally that it will be well for any bride to remember—he can be hurt, and hurt deeply. His marriage to Gloria Swanson proved that.

In 1915, Wally was an actor-executive with the old Essanay Company in Chicago. He had a say in story, in direction, and in casting. Among the extras he picked for a comedy whose name he has forgotten was a dark-haired, blue-eyed youngster. Her real name was? Wally, or the press agents around the lot, renamed her

RED CROSS

First-aid training was given to 5,500,000 persons last year by the American Red Cross, almost twice as many as had been trained in the preceding thirty-one years. The Red Cross had on its rolls at the close of the year 152,584 active first-aid instructors, including 22,421 doctors.

This is only one of the many responsibilities of the American Red Cross.

Gloria Swanson. And so it has been.

Hollywood was coming into being at that time. From California Wally received a wire, tripling his Essanay salary. It was from Keystone, a firm about to make comedy history. Wally moved out West, and soon the extra who had worked in Chicago, and her mother, arrived in Hollywood. Wally got the youngster another job—in 1916 he married her.

Beery watched with greatest interest—he more than watched, he helped—while the extra got her chance (something extras seldom do now). In two years Gloria was a top star, bigger, for the moment, than Wally. Something sensitive in him told him that his wife had reacted—all out—to glamour; that she had "outgrown" the comedian who so deeply loved her. In the stress of emotion . . . and plain hurt . . . Wally did a fool thing: he went to Japan for a year! The excuse was to make a picture; the picture never came to anything. What Wally had really wanted was to get away, with his hurt—away from all who knew him and from all whom he knew.

When he came back from that bitter year, doubt, if there had been doubt, no longer existed. Gloria definitely had other interests. In 1920 she and Wally secured their divorce.

Generosity and the capacity to be hurt are by no means Wally's only qualities. A very close member of his family says of him: "He is a morose and moody guy, at times. He never says much about it; he is very quiet; he just has to get away. With him loneliness isn't a hunger—he has a hunger for loneliness. There's much to be said for both his wives. What would you do if you had a husband, and dinner was ready, and eight o'clock came, and nine, and you received a telephone call from Saugus, or Newhall, and your husband said, "I'm sorry. I'm at the airfield here. I'll be flying around a few days." Women get tired of that. Or . . . you might hear that he was in Wyoming, riding horses like mad . . . with real cowboys . . . and you could assume he'd be back in a few days, unless he broke his neck. A restless man.

Next month we'll tell the story of Wally's astounding youth, of the incredible things he did and did well. We'll see those early markings of character that help explain this big, generous, easily hurt, restless man, now apparently about to begin an important new chapter in his emotional life.

LETTERS FROM JANET BLAIR

his Music in it as well as clothes. Nobody was around because they were all rehearsing over at the Hotel Ballroom, so I went over to his room and Ironed away. The only trouble was I forgot and left the Iron on top of the trunk, and I went off and got dressed for tonight and never thought a thing about it until I heard the fire engines come clanging up the street and saw smoke seeping under the Door. So then of course I ran out and, Mother, it was just Bedlam, with everyone and firemen fighting their way through the smoke, and flames here and there.

Actually, his room doesn't look so bad now that they're all gone away and the fire's out. But you should see his brand new Imported Leather trunk, it is ruined and burnt Black. As soon as I saw it I ran and locked my door. But Louis came and stood outside and shouted angrily through it, adding sarcastically, "I am ordering a new four hundred dollar Imported Leather Ironing board for you at once, my dear Janet!"

Then he stamped away, and I cried and couldn't eat any dinner, and kept Crying all evening so they had to play sad songs for me to sing. I am feeling very, very . . . (THIS IS FIVE MINUTES LATER!)—Mother, everything's all right! He poked a note under the door while I was writing this letter to you, and just saw it and pounced on it, and it says, Let bygones be bygones and how about a date tomorrow night—but please not to press my dress for it, a wrinkled one will do just as well!

So everything's all right again, Mother. I'm so relieved. Whoopee! Love,

JANET.

September 10, 1942.

Mother dear:

Oh, Mother, I am Heartbroken. This morning Louis left for the Army and Heaven knows where they will put him—he is gone out of my Life for good I know. I cried Buckets all last night but did some thinking too, and reached the conclusion that I must take some Action, although I don't know what yet. But here are my reasons Itemized for taking Action:

1. Louis will probably only be in this country for awhile before being shipped overseas, so I must act Quickly.
2. I am twenty-one and grown up, but he still thinks I am a Child.
3. He is thirty-one, and convinced I don't know my own Mind, and not really in love with him. He told me to make Sure by dating other men, so I did, but none of them mean Anything to me since

I could only think of Louis. But he won't Believe me.

4. It is no use trying to convince him any longer, I will just have to Act. What I will do I do not know, but I will do something—this has gone on for three years now and might become Monotonous in his eyes if I let it continue much longer. Or else he might meet some Dangerous older Woman of twenty-six or so who would snag him Away because she is the right Age. So I am going to Act—but how I don't know yet.

I will keep you informed. I just wanted to warn you. Yours with love,

JANET.

October 8, 1942.

Mother my Pet my Darling:

It is done! We are publicly Engaged! And he doesn't mind a bit. I would have wired you as promised but wanted to tell you in Detail how it came about.

You know how the Newspapers have been constantly saying for months now, "Are Janet Blair and Louis Busch engaged or aren't they?" It has been very Annoying. So this morning at eight when the phone rang and woke me up I really saw Red when a reporter's voice said, "Miss Blair, tell me . . ."

So I shouted Angrily, "Yes! YES! We're Engaged! Now let me go back to sleep!"

It was all kind of a sleepy accident, you see, but it was Announced in the papers this afternoon. When I read it, I was shaking in my boots . . . but you never know Men! Instead of being Startled or upset or anything, Louis was pleased, and not only that but when he came up from Camp Santa Ana tonight he had a Newspaper in one hand and a Gorgeous diamond-and-ruby ring in the other. "As long as you Announced our engagement, dear," he said, "I thought you should have a ring."

The only Fly in the ointment is that he thinks we should wait until after the War to get married, because of his Uncertain plans and everything.

But even so, congratulate me, Mother, because at least he thinks I'm old enough now to be Engaged, if not Married.

Yours with love,
JANET.

YOU AND DADDY COME AT ONCE TO CALIFORNIA TO LOUIS' AND MY WEDDING. I FINALLY JUST RANG HIM UP AND TOLD HIM WE WERE BEING MARRIED THIS WEEK END AND HE IS DELIGHTED, AS IF HE'D BEEN WAITING ANXIOUSLY FOR WORD FROM ME. I CANNOT UNDERSTAND MEN THEY ARE MYSTERIES BUT ANYWAY WE ARE BOTH WILDLY HAPPY COME AT ONCE LOVE.

JANET.

August 12, 1943.

Dearest Mother:

We have been married one month today, and we are both so Divinely Happy that we both keep wondering why I didn't Propose four years ago when we first Met. All evening we have been recalling the wonderful Wedding at Lake Arrowhead, in my agent Frank Vincent's house with you and Daddy and Sister and Rosalind Russell and everyone, and the lake water lapping outside and the Wind in the pine trees. And Louis, who is the most Forgetful man usually in the world, has remembered to bring me an Orchid every weekly anniversary, and tonight he brought me a ruby and diamond Wristwatch for our monthly anniversary. Everything is just Heaven!

But we cannot wait until after the War, when we can build a house of our own. This is like Camping Out, having Louis come up once or Twice a week from camp to my apartment, loaded down with his music arrangements for the Santa Ana Air Corps Band. Then I cook dinner, and we have a Jam session of records, and we play Gin Rummy—with him trying to Win the fifty dollar allotment I got from the Government for being an Army wife. So far he's got thirty dollars of it, which he says he will Spend on a Letter-Writing course for me, which is the only critical thing he has said since we got Married. But anyway he says, even though I get a Zero for Capitalizing everything, I get Excellent for just making him Happy and for being (at long last!) the very, very blissful Mrs. Busch!

Goodnight, Mother dear, and we both send love.

JANET.

the dime and at the weather, which was cold but clear, and decided to squander the dime on a Fifth Avenue bus, instead of traveling by subway and saving a nickle. When she left the bus at the apartment building, she was penniless.

As she entered his cage, the elevator man handed her a telegram cancelling the party. It was a body blow. Lonely, discouraged, and beginning to be hungry and frightened, Dinah longed for her father.

"The Negro boy who ran the elevator was the nicest person! He lent me a nickle to call Daddy and reverse the charges. I'll always remember how kind he was!

"I told Daddy how things were and offered to come home. But he was so understanding! 'Check on me right away,' he said. 'Maybe I'm wrong. You've tried hard and you like it there; so stay and try it out a little longer. I'll give you your chance.'

"Almost at once, luck turned for me. I was signed on the NBC network a few days later, and after a while Eddie Cantor hired me."

Her records began to reach top sales. "Yes, My Darling Daughter" sold half a million copies.

wood, Dinah came, too. By then she also had her own program. She was topnotch singer with an almost fantastic following. "I feel she's singing to me personally!" is an almost universal comment. "Dina couldn't sing to me last night," a boy in a far-off jungle wrote, "the static was terrible."

The secret of Dinah Shore is that when she sings, she really is singing to just one person.

"I fit each song to someone I know . . . or imagine," she confessed. "When you sing, you can be fretting about tempo or phrasing or that . . . or you can put yourself into it and stop worrying about mechanics. When you are in high school, you fall for the captain of the football team and sing your songs to him. Say, 'My Man' or 'Why Do I Love You?' There's a song I sing called 'Curly Locks,' about a little boy whose father has gone to war. When I sing that, I feel as if I were my sister, who has the dearest little boy. His father has gone to war, too."

She digressed to explain how wonderful her sister is. Another Dinah Shore secret is that to her all her friends are wonderful. It would have been grand, thinks Dinah, if she could have had a romance as perfect as her sister's.

"They played together as little children; they went to school together. When we took vacation trips, he usually went along. When they grew up they married, never any other sweetheart for either of them. They have two children, and they're truly happy."

In Hollywood her name has been associated with that of two men, both stars, both heartbreakers. One is Lt. James Stewart, and the other is George Montgomery who is in the Army now, too. Dinah refuses to talk about either of them though her closest friends insist that with George she was being merely just as flirtatious as he . . . and that her heart belongs exclusively to Jimmy and that when the war is over, you will hear more of that.

Right now she will only say when she marries, her marriage must be "forever." "Our family has never had a divorce, and I wouldn't want to start anything. If the marriage turned out to be a catastrophe, I wouldn't be too stupid about it, but I think I'm less likely to make a mistake if I take my time." Her face crinkled into laughter.

"The man will wear the pants in our family, definitely. Not dictate to me, like a fuehrer, but if I'm wrong, explain why. I'm fairly reasonable, but I can't be bullied.

"Marriage will be the most important thing that ever happened to me. I'll be like Ginger Rogers, spending my time wherever he is. I'd never dash off to New York on a holiday if he has to be here! I think you can tell when a marriage is beginning to break up: you see the two around in night clubs or out in crowds. When you have things in common, you want to spend your time together, to sit at home and talk and plan."

Home means a lot to Dinah. She shares a house with three other girls, a singer, an actress, and Rufus Crane, a girlhood chum who acts as secretary. They have a cook and eat at home nearly every night, getting a great kick out of inviting boy friends to home cooked meals. None of the girls drink, and they all work hard, so evenings at home seem nicer than dates. If there's no company, they wash their hair—Dinah refuses to sit under a drier, convinced that her generation is going to be bald. Or they cook things. Or Dinah plays around with her camera. She's crazy about cameras, and likes to make portraits of her friends—sympathetic ones that look like them, not weird character studies with creepy shadows.

"We get along beautifully. We like each other. I hope I don't grow bitter as I grow older—it would be nice to mellow like good wine, not turn sour like vinegar. But maybe I shouldn't talk—I've been so lucky!"

Her first salaried job in radio paid Dinah seventeen-fifty a week. That seemed a lot after singing for nothing. But what worried the little redhead, after she had had time to look around, was that so many people who seemed to have a future faded away quickly.

"I knew a publicity man," she told me. "I didn't want him to do publicity campaigns on me, but I did ask him not to let me get lost. I paid him twenty-five a week, and it was the best investment I ever made. All I was getting was seventeen dollars and fifty cents, but I sang here and there for ten to twenty-five dollars every so often, and he was good at waiting for money if things were slow. He stayed with me until recently when he got a wonderful offer. But he was so nice to me! I was so lucky!"

When she arrived in Hollywood, Dinah had several movie offers, but at first she was afraid. Then Warner Brothers asked her to act as well as sing in "Thank Your Lucky Stars." That was fun, and her work led to a long term contract.

Now Samuel Goldwyn has borrowed her for "Up In Arms," in which she co-stars with Danny Kaye and Dana Andrews. Another lucky break.

She's lucky in fathers, too. Mr. Shore understands everything except the "hep" language his daughter speaks.

"If you're around musicians, you naturally pick up 'hep' language," laughs Dinah. "Last night Daddy called up, asking about a boy we know. I said, 'He's in there pitchin.' Daddy said, 'I didn't know they played ball in the Army.' 'They don't— I mean he's in the groove—I mean, he's right on the beam—he's a right—' . . . I almost said, 'He's a right guy'—but if I ever said 'guy' at home, they'd die! 'Daddy, he likes the Army!' I told him.

"But Daddy's learning. When someone's not 'hep,' you say, 'he's strictly on the square,' or you make a square in the air with your fingers—especially if two people are making love in public, which is pretty terrible, you say, 'Get a load of a couple of squares.'

" 'What does "get a load of" mean?' Daddy asks. 'It means "Look at," ' I explain. 'Why not say "look at"—it's shorter!' he says. But now he signs his letters: 'Affectionately, Daddy—(probably a square).'

"I'm so lucky!"

LET'S CALL ON THE McDOWALLS

Over the bed is hung an Indian pennant, and on one chair a souvenir pillow from a friend at Fort Leonard Wood, Maryland. On one shelf of a bookcase, crowded against volumes of Benjamin Franklin, Carl Van Doren, and "Renfrew," is a baseball, personally autographed by Babe Ruth, and on a small table is his treasured typewriter, with which he keeps up on the history of "Fidelis," the imaginary country he invented at the age of six. He's been at work on it ever since: the history of its kings and queens for a thousand years; maps of its principal cities and of the countries surrounding. Roddy has blueprints of which an architectural engineer might be proud, drawn to perfect scale, of such things as the royal palace of "Fidelis," complete down to the final details of even the maid's linen closet! He knows more about the history of "Fidelis" than most of us do about the history of our own country. For that matter, he could put many to shame there, too, for American history, long before he came here, was one of his favorite subjects at school. How did he come to begin the endlessly detailed saga of this country, "Fidelis?"

"I believe," he reflects, with an air of quiet mischief, "it was in a history class where I'd read pages and pages ahead of where we were studying. I started it to pass the time and it—it got me."

When the McDowalls start telling jokes on one another, everybody bubbles at once. Roddy's favorite gag about his mother is of an incident which occurred during their recent tour. When people would ask her for autographs, she would sign, with charmingly characteristic modesty, "Mrs. McDowall—Roddy's mother." Roddy turned the tables by signing himself, "Roddy—W. L.'s son."

"The W. L.'s for 'Winifred Lucinda,'" he teases, "and she's got four other names, which I daren't tell, if I did know them!"

Virginia's favorite tale about Roddy concerns the time a luscious peach she'd saved mysteriously disappeared from the dining room bowl. She was busy with the evening dishes, and scolding him from the kitchen. When she got no answer, she tiptoed back to the dining room. Roddy had vanished. He couldn't have left the room without her seeing him. She looked under the table. No Roddy. Suddenly she cried aloud, laughing, "No, no, it can't be!" But it was. Roddy had contrived to crawl into the buffet, shutting the doors behind him.

"I sure pulled him out of there," Virginia exlaims.

"But not," shouts Roddy, "before I pulled her in. She got stuck half-way and wound up by me having to rescue her!"

At any meal . . . or at any hour of the day or night . . . a boy in uniform may dash up to the McDowall household . . . or into it, since they've given their favorite service men latch keys of their own. These are youngsters the McDowalls have met at the Hollywood Canteen or just along the road, thumbing a lift. They're boys who relish a touch of home, and that's exactly what they get. You'd think they were boys the McDowalls had known all their lives . . . until you find out it's just been the past couple of weeks since they met. They get their favorite dishes at the table; they rib Roddy the way they would their own kid brothers; they go jitterbugging with Virginia. They tell of their dreams, their "other" homes, and of their problems, to Mother McDowall. And when they are shipped away, the McDowalls, though they've an endless tide of fan mail to take care of, keep regular correspondence with them whether they're in Tunisia, New Guinea, or Sicily!

Sometimes there's talk about the difference between Americans and Englishmen. Well, the McDowalls have been here only three years, and their home is as typically Yankee as can be imagined. Even to the food. When it comes to Philadelphia scrapple, hot cakes, waffles, and crullers, the McDowall kitchen is as typically American as they come. It's their American friends who insist upon English sausage and Yorkshire pudding, according to Mrs. McDowall.

"In our first lonely days here," Mrs. McDowall recalls, "there were two men who made it possible to go on. Ed Morrow's broadcasts from London and Ernie Pyle's news reports telling of the courage of those at home gave our life meaning."

But there's no time for melancholy today. Aside from turning their home into a branch U. S. O., the MacDowalls spend their Saturday nights at the Hollywood Canteen, "at the coke stand, in the kitchen or wherever they want to put us."

And bonds? Whenever and wherever Roddy possibly can, he's out making speeches at defense plants, speeches he often writes himself. He closed one speech, to a crowd of workers at an aircraft plant, with a hope which left thousands of men and women reverently silent. "Today America and England stand together building to beat three countries that would like to destroy the world. We are United Nations, and let us hope that after this war we will still be United Nations . . . still building, building for an everlasting peace. And remember, when you go home to your comfortable beds at night, that people in many countries, cities, towns, and villages, do not have beds . . . or homes . . ."

The McDowalls, during their last six weeks in London, lived through six weeks of continuous air raids. Not once did they sleep in a bed. On the voyage across the Atlantic, their convoy was repeatedly bombed.

Is it any wonder, then, that twenty-four hours a day Roddy and his mother and sister live in such a way that their house fairly sings at the top of its voice—"Welcome—here is home!" If this house could talk, it would wink and say, "Huntin' a cure for those woe-is-me blues? Come on over to McDowall's!"

WORDS OF MUSIC

switched from the Variety formula with comedians, etc., to just straight music. "Your Dubonnet Date" with Xavier Cugat's orchestra and Lina Romay and Don Rodney in the vocal spotlight, is now heard over the Blue Network. This program is the only big time musical show presented during the morning hours—check your local papers for exact day and time. . . .

It's nice to have Dick Powell and Martha Tilton back on the air—they're both on CBS's Campana Serenade, another all-music show. . . .

David Street, the vocal boy on the Joan Davis-Jack Haley Sealtest Show over NBC, is a lad to watch. He sings a rhythm tune as well as he does a ballad, plus doing a good job on reading lines, and, girls—he's not married. Take a gander at the picture of him in this issue. . . . Nan Wynn, who has voice-doubled for Rita Hayworth whenever Rita has had to sing on the screen, is now concentrating on her own singing career over CBS. . . . Have you noticed that Bea Wain has been singing with more oomph and spirit lately on the Hit Parade? Maybe it's the Sinatra influence. . . .

SWOON STUFF:

Speaking of Sinatra, to say that Frank took Hollywood by storm would be putting it mildly. He packed the Hollywood Bowl for his concert, tied up Vine Street traffic the days he did his broadcasts, and the line formed to the right outside the stages of the RKO lot when he made his picture. He sang at a big benefit show at the ultra-smart Mocambo and was a sensation. His audience consisted of movie bigwigs, stars, executives, etc., who had paid twenty-five dollars a plate, and though they didn't swoon, they made up for it with applause. Frank came prepared to do six numbers, and wound up doing fourteen. . . . An amusing thing happened one afternoon at Brittingham's, a restaurant next door to CBS on Sunset Blvd. Frank was sitting at the counter alone, having a cup of coffee. Two CBS secretaries came in and sat right near him, but didn't notice him. They were chatting about the fact that they couldn't understand all the hysteria over Sinatra—what did he have that was so terrific?—oh, of course he did sing wonderfully, but they just couldn't understand silly girls getting so excited over a guy who wasn't even good looking, wasn't tall enough, and he was married besides, etc. All of a sudden, Frank, who had heard the whole conversation, started to laugh out loud. They turned and saw who it was and made a hasty, embarrassed exit. Which proves that Frank has a good sense of humor about himself. . . .

JAM NOTES:

It's hard to keep up with Benny Goodman the way he has been changing his personnel. He's had five new girl singers in as many months, and his musicians barely get to know each other before Benny decides to change men again. He goes on one of these rampages every once in a while, but somehow he always manages to have a good band. . . .

Tommy Dorsey did a little changing too, and when he opened at the Pennsylvania Hotel in New York, he had a completely new orchestra, with the exception of three or four men and vocalists Betty Brewer and Skip Nelson. . . .

Jane Pickens, formerly of the Pickens Sisters Trio of radio fame, is now soloing it and doing a swell job. She has been appearing in night clubs. . . .

Paula Kelly replaced Marion Hutton with the Modernaires when Marion decided to try movies. . . . Buddy Moreno, Harry James' singer, was given a 1A classification and a deferment until James finished his Metro pictures. . . . The Delta Rhythm Boys, negro quartet from radio and nightclubs, have been signed at Universal. . . . Elizabeth Tilton is with the Jan Garber band, now playing theatre dates. . . . Mitchell Ayres doubled at the Aragon Ballroom on the Santa Monica pier while making his Universal Picture and made a hit on his first West Coast appearance. . . .

If Harry James' baby turns out to be a little "trumpet player" he wants to name it Joshua. . . . Corky Cornelius, the famous trumpeter with the Casa Loma band, died in New York in August of an acute kidney condition after only a three-day illness. His widow, Irene Daye, plans to go back to singing, but in radio this time. She says that working with a band will keep her away from her baby too much. Irene and Corky met when they worked with the Gene Krupa band. . . .

THE END

Pat O'Brien's camp show patter, his readings of "America," Patrick Henry's speech, and the rest, which the service boys applauded so heartily on his tours, is being recorded and will become an album for Decca's new season. Yep, there's also an Irish song by Patrick—and even Sinatra thought he was good.

MIRACULOUS HEALING OF JOE E. BROWN

We just can't listen!"

"So I went on for an hour and a half in pitch black night. It began to rain and poured down in buckets, but they didn't mind that either."

Just as in Alaska and the Aleutians, Joe found the boys on Rabaul, Tulagi, and the other islands literally with nothing in the way of entertainment. Even with the crudest kind of set-up, there were no picture shows because the enemy was such a little distance away—just across the water on the next island. They had no equipment for sports because no one had sent them any.

They had been actually carried away from civilization and everything to which they had been accustomed. They had been set down in a primitive life, tropic, strange and lonely. They were entirely dependent upon each other for any meager entertainment.

But out of that loneliness and often frightening strangeness, Joe found that they have developed strength and self-reliance. He found it true that there are no atheists in fox holes.

Those boys, many of them little more than children when they went into service, were now always ready to joke and wise-crack in the palm-thatched hospitals. Yet when the Padre came to talk with them and to pray, they joined him gladly, and they were not ashamed to be seen reading their Bibles. All they seemed to want was to be well quickly as possible so they could get back on duty to fight the enemy they hated with a clean and searing hate.

"I learned to lose fear after I'd talked to them," Joe said. "In fact, I found I just didn't have any fear. The doctors and nurses told me I'd better not go into the wards where the boys with contagious diseases were, but I never thought of not going. I shook hands with them and cheered them up just the way I did the wounded boys.

"The infections didn't get to me. No illness attacked me . . . and that's the way it was meant to be."

Thus, through those soldiers' faith, Joe learned a faith that helped him who had come to help them.

He played two hundred and seventy shows in one hundred and three days, going from island to island. He met many men he had known in civilian life—Lloyd Pantages, theater owner and Hollywood personality, looked up at him from the audience with the one good eye he had left. At another show, a Hollywood columnist stopped to say hello as casually as if they had met on the Boulevard. Everywhere notes with names, addresses, and telephone numbers were passed up to him with bashful, homesick requests to write to or call up Mom or Dad or the Best Girl.

Then came the miracle. Joe feels shy about discussing it, but Kathryn Brown, with all the joy of a loving wife whose heart was heavy for him, then, tells you:

"We don't try to explain how it happened, but suddenly Joe was well. On one of the rough, makeshift, plank stages, out there in the South Pacific, he found himself dancing. He just couldn't believe it, he who had been hardly able to walk when leaving home—there he was . . . dancing.

"Joe and I talked it over after he got back. We'd got out a big package of letters that had come from all over the country when it was known Joe was going to the Southwest Pacific. Mothers had written those letters—mothers of boys in the service out there—and they all said they were praying for Joe's safety and well being because he was trying to bring a little happiness to their sons.

"We believe those prayers healed Joe. Or maybe it was the prayers of the boys he visited. Something did. His shortened leg has come back to normal now. And from that day on, he hasn't had a twinge of pain."

Joe's back now. In the meantime, he's playing in "Pin-Up Girl" with Betty Grable at 20th Century-Fox. He has a show on the radio, too, Sunday nights over the NBC Network. And he's getting a mammoth baseball game under way with all the Big League players on the field and picture stars in the boxes. The proceeds of the game are going into a fund to buy sports equipment for the boys overseas.

And just so this good work won't end there, he's formed a corporation of business men—which they hope to make into a million-dollar undertaking and nationwide—to raise more funds for the same purpose.

And where's Joe going next?

"Why, to Rome, of course. And when I get back from there, General MacArthur's promised to take me with him on the first plane into Manila. After that, it's just a short hop to Tokyo."

Some people talk about the sorrows that have hurt them deeply; others find relief and a greater joy than they have ever known before in helping other people.

Joe E. Brown is one of these . . . and perhaps in the seas of laughing faces that have looked up at him so eagerly, he sees just one face that he misses very much.

JUDY GARLAND SAYS

numbers were tunes like "Stormy Weather," which I sang wrapped in a black shawl, sitting on a piano on a dark stage, only my face spotlighted. At the song's conclusion, I threw off the shawl and the lights came on. I then did my six-year-old curtsy. I wanted to do "Drums of My Heart" for my first screen song, but Roger said no. Simple songs were best for children. He wrote "Dear Mr. Gable" for me; he was right. The people liked it, and it started me on my real screen career.

I'M LEFT HANDED:

When I write, my hand smudges the ink as I cross the page. I've discovered that putting talcum powder on my hand will permit it to ride along without smudging. South Paws, attention!

I'M FOND OF:

Penny candy . . . John-Frederics cologne . . . Novelty jewelry . . . Good Humor ice cream . . . Biographies . . . Surprises . . . A Tuesday special (a hug and a kiss from my little niece).

I WONDER:

Where all my best answers go when I wish I could think of them . . . Who invents those frightful lipsticks some girls wear . . . Why weeds grow so much larger than anything else in a victory garden . . . If hair that's flat on top of the head will really come back soon . . . And when the war will end.

WHEN I WENT TO SCHOOL:

At Lawler's Professional school for children, twelve years ago, my schoolmates were Mickey Rooney, Anne Shirley (then Dawn O'Day), Jackie Cooper, Frankie Darrow, Diane Lewis; they all made good, and we're all still friends.

I was always so busy trying to get out of studying that I never really learned anything.

I THINK IT'S FUN:

To wash my own hair . . . Dust furniture that gleams after you dust it . . . Go into a shop and buy what I want without tiresome delays . . . To cry at movies and eat candy while I cry.

MY NICKNAME:

"Judaline" was given me by Director Victor Fleming in "Wizard of Oz," but only my family uses it. My sister, Jimmie's baby, Judy Gail Sherwood, is also nicknamed "Judaline."

MY BIGGEST THRILL:

Was my twenty-first birthday party last June. My sister, Jimmie, Danny Kaye, Keenan Wynn, Dore Schary, and Betty Asher surprised me by making records of a script they'd written called "The Life of Judy Garland." It began with my first cry, which Danny Kaye gave to the tune of "Over the Rainbow" and continued in a kidding vein to tell what had happened to me in twenty-one years. It was terribly funny, but it ended with a serious little speech given by Keenan so beautiful that I cried—I was so touched and so happy.

MY SPECIAL HEROINE:

Is Madame Chiang Kai-shek.

MY FAVORITE FICTION CHAR.:

Is Claudia. And I want a little farm in Connecticut like the one she had, and a little house exactly like hers.

MY SECRET AMBITION:

Is to write fiction. I've written a book of verse, and I love to write stories. I don't believe I'd care for literature as a living because I can't write unless I'm in the mood. But when I am in the mood, I can write for hours.

I'D LOVE TO:

Do a big musical show on the New York stage.

I ADORE:

Richard Tabor's recording of "Vienna, City of Dreams." I wish I could have seen Vienna as it was in his time. I'd like to have been part of that life where all women were glamorous, all men romantic, everything was exciting, and no one was ever dull or lonely or sad.

THE END

The soldiers address Loretta Young as "Mrs. Colonel Lewis," and how she likes it! Since returning from her camp tour, Loretta has been band-wagoning for other stars to go out as she did—simply to meet and visit with the boys. Loretta experimented with this type of "personalized" personal appearance at the camps last spring—made no stage appearances, no speeches, no planned program patter. She simply went into the hospitals, to the training centers, posts, and on ships—met the boys, hundreds of them, face to face, talked to them individually, had mess with them, attended chapel and comforted the wounded.

"I didn't have to sing, or dance, or be funny," said Loretta, "and neither do other stars, whose principal forte is acting. The boys were grand, and I enjoyed every moment. I'm going out again as soon as I can."

Ann Sothern is another star who regularly makes these tours. Ann calls them "hand shaking tours" and she concentrates on hospitals. The boys all call her "Maisie" and Ann obliges with typical Maisie cracks.

LARAINE DAY AND WAR WIVES

feel he is still the boss, and don't make all the decisions yourself. It's wrong for a wife to give her husband the impression that she is so efficient, so capable, that she can do without him. And if she is lonely for him, she should certainly tell him. In many cases, when couples have lived together only a few days or weeks, they can really get acquainted through correspondence, and build something solid and beautiful between them.

"Another tip," she said smiling, "and this too comes from my experience: don't feel sorry for yourself! Self pity is the worst thing for the morale of a war-lorn bride."

She said once she hadn't seen Ray for four months. Just when he came to Hollywood on a brief furlough, she was leaving town on a bond selling tour. They couldn't meet, just talked on the phone. She felt so sorry for herself that she couldn't help crying. The more she cried, the worse she felt. Then she saw a boy on the train, a boy invalided home from the Solomons.

When the war is over and the men come back? That would be the climax of this whole national and international drama of women without their men. In some individual cases that climax would be also a crisis, no doubt, as couples grow away from each other and change so much that they become strangers.

"When the war is over, Ray and I will forget everything and have a honeymoon," Laraine said. "I think all American wives will come out of this war better in every respect, more tolerant, more broadminded, more cooperative, with bigger hearts and bigger minds, mellowed by suffering, by loneliness, by common sacrifices. Out of these sacrifices there will be a new American unity, such as we've never known before."

MOVIELAND'S BEAUTY PARLOR

up to and behind the ears. It's important from the standpoint of accelerated circulation.

It isn't necessary to allow your night cream to remain on all night. Fifteen or twenty minutes is sufficient for skin absorption, after which the surplus can be removed with tissue. Simple enough, isn't it?

If you're one of the unfortunates who has a double or flabby chin, we offer another little helpful hint. Frances is far from ever having such a chin, but she was gracious enough to illustrate the simple trick.

Just soak a piece of absorbent cotton in skin freshener or astringent and hold it under your chin for four or five minutes nightly, and you'll find it beneficial.

Your morning cleansing of the neck should be made with an application of cleansing cream, removed with tissue, and followed by a quick run-over with cotton soaked in skin freshener to tone your skin and remove any remaining traces of cream. Don't allow the skin freshener to dry on the skin, but remove it, too, with tissue or a soft towel.

If you're an all-week-at-home body, or if you're spending Sunday in the back yard or just lounging around the house, we offer a one-day skin rejuvenation that is wonderful for both face and neck.

Dash to the nearest drugstore and equip yourself with a bottle of baby oil . . . and therein lies the secret. It's a perfectly wonderful lubricant. Smooth a thin film of the oil over your face and neck and allow it to remain on as long as possible— all day, if you can. If you are in a warm winter climate, a la Hollywood, it's good in the sun, too, but common sense must prevail here as with your use of all other oils under the sun. You are not supposed to cook in it. There's a time limit to sun dosage, with or without oil.

Wash the oil off with warm water and soap, and feel the luxurious silkiness of your skin. Not to mention the fact that you'll find that a goodly portion of those tiny lines have completely disappeared.

If you've kept this baby oil on all day and aren't stepping out for a date, after washing it off, follow your regular nightly routine with night cream. The following morning, we assure you, you'll present a baby face to the world.

This is a really inside Hollywood beauty secret, and we always figure that anything that's good enough for the stars must be good enough for you, too.

Do all these things, and you'll win the beauty race "by a neck!"

Exercise of the Month:

Here we are, back in the neck division again! We couldn't leave the subject, though, because Ginny Simms came to the fore with such a swell, trouble-solving routine.

If you're the possessor of a "hollow neck," it's for you.

Ginny crooks her elbows at shoulder height, with the fingers of her hands touched lightly together and pointed outward. Then, clenching her teeth (really clench them, drawing the corners of your mouth outward!), she presses her fingers tightly together and exhales.

She relaxes while inhaling and then repeats.

After several times, Ginny varies this exercise by holding her fingers at bust height and then again at waist height.

If you like this exercise, a word to you as a beginner: To start with, don't do the exercise more than four times in each position.

This nice Simms gal does double

Statement of the Ownership, Management, Circulation, etc., required by the Acts of Congress of August 24, 1912, and March 3, 1933, of Movieland, published monthly at Dunellen, New Jersey, for October 1, 1943

State of New York } ss.
County of New York }

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Phil Keenan who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Business Manager of the Movieland and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, as amended by the Act of March 3, 1933, embodied in section 537, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

2. That the owner is: (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding one per cent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a firm, company, or other unincorporated concern, its name and address, as well as those of each individual member, must be given.) Movieland, Inc., 1476 Broadway, New York; Hillman Periodicals, Inc., 1476 Broadway, New York; Stockholders: Rita Hillman, 1476 Broadway, New York; Alex Hillman, 1476 Broadway, New York.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are (If there are none, so state.) None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

duty as a movie and radio star, so it isn't surprising that she likes her exercises to do double duty, too. She told us of one exercise that gives her more than triple value for each minute she devoted to it, for, while reducing the hips, it strengthens calves, arches, and ankles.

Here's the way Ginny does it: Standing with her feet parallel and about eighteen inches apart, she rises on her toes, turning her heels inward as far as possible. Then she relaxes and repeats. (Believe us, you'll be glad to relax before repeating!)

As a beginner, this exercise should not be done more than eight times daily. We offer this precaution, but we rather think you'll find out for yourself that discretion is the better part of valor.

Exercise of the Month:

We're cheating this time, but we have a hunch you're going to like cheating with us.

It's human nature to revolt against exercises that seem troublesome or at all strenuous, so we're stepping out of line and giving you two Hollywood exercises that are so easy that even the laziest of you will welcome them . . . and, best of all, they tie in directly with beauty.

Do you remember "Alice in Wonderland?"

"You are old, Father William," Lewis Carroll's "young man" said, ". . . and yet you incessantly stand on your head."

Silly? Not at all. Beauty experts have long claimed that headstanding is tops for the circulation, which in turn promotes good complexions.

Like you, we have a hunch that Nancy Coleman is a little on the less energetic side. She tells us she likes the principle involved and the results to be obtained; but she doesn't go all-out on the headstanding routine. Nancy's trick is to lie across her bed every morning, with her head hanging lower than the rest of her body. And, confidentially, she confides that it's a wonderful routine for waking up when the alarm clock is snarling at you.

Then there's relaxation for beauty.

Ida Lupino gives us what she claims is a most potent means of relaxation. Ida lies flat on her tummy, head to one side, one arm crooked above her head and the other lying at her side. Such catnapping for five minutes, with no worries allowed to crowd into your mind, will work wonders for the weariest of weary bodies.

Exciting news this month was the birth of twin sons to Jane Wyatt—arriving two months prematurely. One weighed only four pounds and the other, three. The doctors despaired of the smaller one's life, at the beginning. But miraculously, it grew stronger daily. Michael and Nicholas, the twins have been named. Offers for new picture roles started pouring in, with Jane still at Good Samaritan hospital. It's said she'll resume work in a very short while.

Eye-Tagging With Tea Bags:

Over on the MGM lot, we found that star of "Cry Havoc," Ann Sothern, who chose to talk about tea, of all things, in connection with beauty.

Ann, it seems, not only drinks her tea but uses it, too, for beauty, which is a cute trick. She saves her tea bags from her luncheon tea for that period before the night's social doings when all of us, if smart, endeavor to lie down and relax for fifteen minutes before dressing. During that fifteen-minute period, Ann places a still-damp tea bag over each closed eye, and allows it to remain for the full rest period. She assures us it's soothing to the eyes, and relieves any feeling of strain, in turn smoothing out those tiny wrinkles caused by the day's fatigue.

Growing, Growing, Grown!

Having trouble getting your hair to grow?

Donna Reed, another of MGM's lovelies, has the same problem. She finds that hot oil treatments do wonders for her hair and scalp.

Even as you, Donna can't always find time for a beauty parlor appointment, so she ups and gives herself hot oil treatments.

Her recipe is to mix castor oil and and olive oil in equal portions and warm the mixture. She parts her hair in sections and, with a piece of absorbent cotton dipped in the oil, rubs it onto her scalp, being careful to cover the whole head.

Quickly, now, all hair goes on top of the head and is covered with a hot, steaming towel. (Careful on that steam, so you don't burn your scalp!) Once isn't enough, my hearty. Put on a second steaming towel, just as Donna does, to be sure that the oil really penetrates.

For the shampoo proper, Donna uses soft water and a liquid soap, and lets us in on her secret for successful removal of all traces of oil: She rubs the soap directly on the oily head, before putting water to it, and thus cuts the oil and allows for its easy disappearance.

It's a swell home treatment, but be certain you shampoo with enough soap and vim and vigor to get rid of every trace of oil or yours is going to be a sorry head!

Beauty Chatter:

Perk up your ears, girls, and we're off on another gab-fest.

Number 1 among the soap and water addicts is Joan Crawford, who follows her face scrubbing with heated cream. Joan takes a bit of cold cream on a tablespoon, holds it close to a heater until it is liquefied. She finds it penetrates more readily. . . . And Olivia de Havilland, who, besides sporting a set of Hollywood's most beautiful eyebrows, is constantly burying her lovely nose in some book, comes up to inform us that bronze tweezers were used to keep eyebrows neat and arched as far back as 1500 B. C. Maybe there isn't anything new under the sun . . . if you're wearing your hair in reverse rolls and having trouble getting them to stay, here's a tip from Evelyn Ankers. Taking an underneath part, she makes a tiny braid which acts as an anchor for the bobby pins put into the reverse roll . . . Joan Leslie "sets" her make-up and gives it extra sparkle by running a slightly dampened sponge over the finished job . . . Eyes tired? Try Nancy Coleman's trick of staring at an object about forehead level, then, without removing your eyes from the object, swing your head left, then right, repeating until all strain is gone . . . For exercise, Rita Hayworth says, "Dance!"—just simple steps to your favorite records for a half hour daily. It's fun and it's pleasant . . . And Paulette Goddard is emphatic in saying that skin beauty comes from within. Plenty of milk and raw vegetables, exercise and regular sun baths, all contribute to Paulette's beautiful, clear skin . . . Last but not least, Alexis Smith applies vaseline sparingly over her eyelids to highlight the eyes. Judging from the beauty and sparkle of Alexis' eyes, it's a swell tip!

cut narration spoken by Brian Donlevy clarify the strategy and take an audience into the confidence of the general staff much as did "Desert Victory." You will see the use of a secret rocket weapon of which no more is known than is herein disclosed. You also will see bazooka guns in action and wave upon wave of swift tanks and horse-mounted Cossacks. For such great moments as the joy of the Soviet soldiers when the spearheads join, "Heroic Stalingrad" is very worthwhile. See it if you can take the current war straight.

FIRED WIFE (Universal) is a bubbly marital farce ingratiatingly performed by Louise Allbritton and Robert Paige, both of whom are on the high road to screen success. The plot is nothing more than a variation of a familiar theme, the conflict of marriage and careers. Yet it has been handled brightly enough in a sophisticated style to hand you a lot of new laughs. You can believe the majority of the comedy entanglements, although it is difficult to believe Diana Barrymore in her role of an enchantress. The daughter of the late John appears much too dowdy and overweight to enchant anyone, particularly when she is sharing the screen with the slick and fascinating Louise Allbritton. Walter Abel has a good role which helps balance the fun, and the chap playing a foreign actor is a comparative newcomer named George Dolenz. He is likely to become important.

PREVIOUSLY RECOMMENDED

THIS IS THE ARMY (Warners) the Irving Berlin all-soldier entertainment is still coining profits for the Army Emergency Relief Fund, the answer being that the screen version is something you can't afford to miss for your own morale.

HOLY MATRIMONY (20th Century-Fox) one of the funniest comedies of the season, with Monty Woolley and Gracie Fields deliriously concerned.

WATCH ON THE RHINE (Warners) a splendid, thought-provoking drama superbly brought home by the fine acting of Bette Davis and Paul Lukas.

SO PROUDLY WE HAIL (Paramount) an enormously moving tribute to the heroic nurses of Bataan as personified by Claudette Colbert, Paulette Goddard, and Veronica Lake.

LASSIE COME HOME (MGM) a simple and sincere story of a dog's love for a boy which will appeal to the whole family.

CLAUDIA (20th Century-Fox) a slice of domestic American with Dorothy McGuire repeating the hit she made in the title role on the stage.

FOR WHOM THE BELL TOLLS (Paramount) a pretentious depiction of Hemingway's novel of the Spanish Civil War, with Gary Cooper, Ingrid Bergman, and Katina Paxinou.

HEAVEN CAN WAIT (20th Century-Fox) a gay time with Ernst Lubitsch looking at life after an old blade seeks admission to Hades.

VICTORY THROUGH AIR POWER (United Artists) Walt Disney making graphic, as only he can, the argument by Alexander P. de Seversky for an immediate blow to wipe out the Axis.

HERS TO HOLD (Universal) the modern wartime comedy that brings Deanna Durbin to graceful maturity.

NEW DANCER IN FAMILY

Since Betty Grable is retiring to await the stork her husband Harry James is taking up the dancing department for the family. He is taking dancing lessons for "Mr. Coed," his M-G-M picture.

His coach is the famous Jack Donahue, who used to teach Shirley Temple at Fox. Donahue was the last American to leave the Scandanavian Peninsula after the outbreak of the war. He had been in England where he had his own nightclub and appeared in plays in London. He was visiting his wife Tutta Rolfe, famous Norwegian actress, in Norway when the Germans came. They commandeered his car and made him drive them around. How he and Tutta escaped is a harrowing story and one that Harry James is trying to get Donahue to write for the films.

STORIES ABOUT GARBO

A certain young man in town captured the fancy of the great Greta Garbo. He basked in the limelight of her favor for about two months. Friends of his asked him what he and Garbo talked about.

This is what he told.

They would sit on the terrace at her house, hold hands, and Garbo would say, "Close your eyes and let's go to Paris." They would and did. Then they would journey in their imagination to London, to Siam, and all far countries.

That is the fun of falling in love with the ethereal Swede. You go so easily to such amazing places.

Another Garbo chuckle is one she tells herself. She is ever on the hunt for a new house. One day she went to inspect the house of Producer Brynie Foy.

After seeing the whole house, Mrs. Foy asked Greta whether she would like to see the swimming pool.

Miss Garbo looked out the window and said, "But there is a man down there." Mrs. Foy explained that it was just Mr. Foy, and he didn't really matter.

Garbo turned to Mrs. Foy and said, "But it might be embarrassing to him to see me looking at his house and besides 'I want to be alone.'" It was out before she knew it, and she even broke herself up. She and Mrs. Foy leaned against the wall and laughed until tears rolled down their cheeks.

Then they went arm in arm down to the pool. Miss Garbo inspected the pool, spoke to Mr. Foy, and left. But she didn't rent the house!

WARNING FOR PIN-UPS

The Pin-Up girls of the motion pictures are having a run for their money. The Walt Disney studio sends out once a month a series of wonderfully drawn pin-up girls. They are sent to Disney employees now in the service and then the left-overs to whoever request them.

The trick on the pictures is that they don't have to go through the Hays office in Hollywood, thus they are very undressed young ladies. Betty Grable and Dorothy Lamour better watch out.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES

The new rave, Sonny Tufts, is safely married and very happy, although his studio doesn't publicize it . . . Lieutenant Eddie Albert keeps the long distance wires hot at Anne Shirley's house; even if she doesn't care, he still does . . . Irene, dress designer at Metro, had a whole new wardrobe made for herself before her husband, Captain Elliot Gibbons, returned from a year's service with the Ferry Command in Africa.

Are You in the Know?

Would you wear this number for ☐ School ☐ Dating
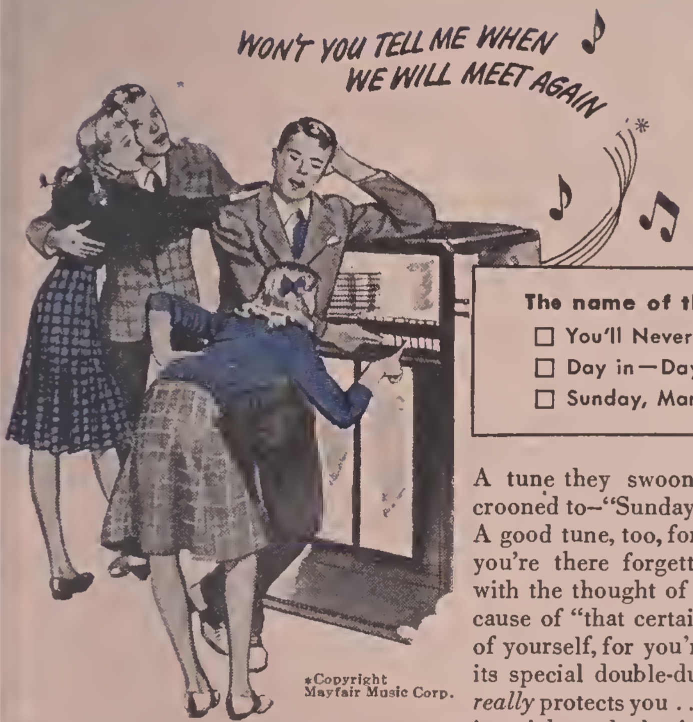
☐ Ping Pong Parties

Know what's what to wear for when! But how you wear your clothes is vital. For instance, with the proper posture: head up, chin in, shoulders flat, tummy pulled in. And, with that utterly-at-ease look . . . especially important on "those" days, when nagging little worries can change a girl from a wow to a wallflower! Trust to Kotex sanitary napkins. Those flat, pressed ends of Kotex don't show. So relax in the dating number (above). No outlines need spoil your style.

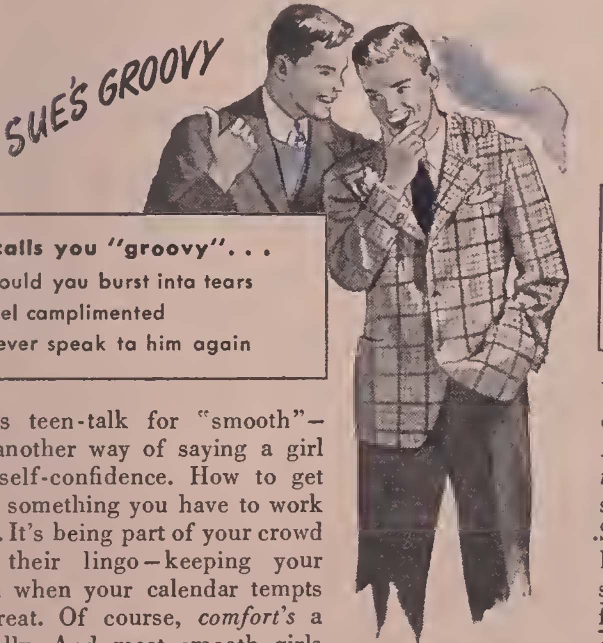


WON'T YOU TELL ME WHEN WE WILL MEET AGAIN*

*Copyright Mayfair Music Corp.

The name of this song is . . .
☐ You'll Never Know
☐ Day in—Day Out
☐ Sunday, Monday, or Always

A tune they swoon to—when gals are crooned to—"Sunday, Monday, or Always". A good tune, too, for a juke session—and you're there forgetting you ever flirted with the thought of missing the fun (because of "that certain time"). You're sure of yourself, for you're sure of Kotex, with its special double-duty safety center that really protects you . . . sends doubt scurrying eight-to-the-bar!



If he calls you "groovy". . .
☐ Would you burst into tears
☐ Feel complimented
☐ Never speak to him again

"Groovy" is teen-talk for "smooth"—and that's another way of saying a girl has poise, self-confidence. How to get groovy? It's something you have to work at, full time. It's being part of your crowd—speaking their lingo—keeping your dates—even when your calendar tempts you to retreat. Of course, comfort's a wonderful ally. And most smooth girls know that Kotex is more comfortable.

Did this girl score . . .
☐ A hit
☐ An ace
☐ A strike

You're up on your pins if you got this one! You're in on America's No. 1 sport. And if you're a good sport, you'll bowl regularly, for that's what keeps your team scoring. It keeps you scoring for Uncle Sam, too, by helping you stay fit. So don't let down on trying days. Remember, Kotex stays soft while wearing . . . doesn't just feel soft at first touch. You'll get greater comfort, and you can rule chafing right out of your game. (We almost forgot—she scored a strike!)

Girls in the know choose KOTEX*

Yes, more girls choose KOTEX than all other brands of pads put together.

IT'S A WISE GIRL who knows that a powder deodorant is best for sanitary napkins. Quest Powder, the Kotex deodorant, was created expressly for this use. See how completely Quest destroys odors. It's unscented, safe, sure protection.

(*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.)

STOP GUESSING!

☐ Check here if you're teen age and want free the newly edited booklet "As One Girl To Another". You'll learn do's and don'ts for difficult days . . . the lowdown on grooming, sports, social contacts.

If you're the mother or friend of a teen-age girl and want the booklet "As One Girl To Another", please check here ☐

The METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

On all the Broadways of America, there's a milling to get into the most extravagant extravaganza in years entitled "Thousands Cheer".

* * * *

It is "M-G-M's Thousands Cheer" if you please, for practically every big name on the big roster of that big studio is represented in the cast.

* * * *

It is essentially a love story that revolves around Kathryn Grayson and Gene Kelly. But they are the baton wavers in a parade that brings out the exact and thoroughly demonstrated talents of—

* * * *

Mickey Rooney, Judy Garland, Red Skelton, Eleanor Powell, Ann Sothern, Lucille Ball, Virginia O'Brien, Frank Morgan, Lena Horne—Shall we go on?

* * * *

Oh very well—Marsha Hunt, Marilyn Maxwell, Donna Reed, Margaret O'Brien, June Allyson, Gloria DeHaven, John Conte, Sara Haden—getting winded?

* * * *

Well—Ben Blue, Frances Rafferty, Mary Elliott, Frank Jenks, Frank Sully, Dick Simmons, Ben Lessy, Don Loper and Maxine Barrat—whew!

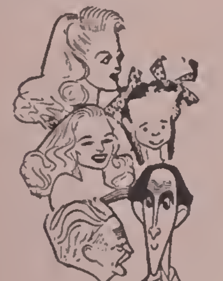
* * * *

Plus three great name bands—Kay Kyser and Orchestra, Bob Crosby and Orchestra, Benny Carter and Band.

* * * *

And lest we forget, the incomparable Jose Iturbi not only plays his immortal piano but acts like a Lunt.

* * * *



This remarkable three-ringed show is photographed in Technicolor, directed by George Sidney and produced by the veteran Joseph Pasternak. It is an original screen play by Paul Jarrico and Richard Collins who dreamed up a dream of a story about Private Miss Jones.

* * * *

It has the true Army flavor. That's why the most important letters in "Thousands Cheer" are U.S.A.

* * * *

You'll be one of the millions to cheer M-G-M's Thousands. We're in it too—at the very beginning we roar. — Leo

WHY DEANNA AND PAUL ARE SEPARATING

Hollywood was very sorry to hear that Deanna Durbin and Vaughn Paul had come to the parting of the ways. It was no surprise, however, even though you may read, here and there, that it was. There had actually been trouble brewing for a long while.

The first inkling of trouble was when Deanna began appearing socially with Edmund O'Brien, her leading man in "The Amazing Mrs. Halliday." In any other town a young wife, separated by war from her service husband, might have appeared with a handsome "other man" and had that date be meaningless. But in a place like Hollywood such meetings assume a special significance, no matter how casual they may actually be. So the Durbin-O'Brien date did cause eyebrow-raising in the film colony.

It's saddening, though, that it did happen. Vaughn, now Lt. Paul of the U. S. Navy, was Deanna's first beau, her first love. They married in an aura of romance, and most certainly they intended to live happily ever after. "Ever after" turned out to be only about two years.

The separation that the war put upon them, Deanna's growing up, both in years and in her work, the handicaps that fame and fortune puts on all movieland marriages; these factors conspired to kill this romance.

SOMEBODY LOVES DEANNA

There is one romantic story about Deanna that I do not believe has been told until now. It concerns a particularly nice young man about movieland. Ever since her first films, this intelligent, charming young man has been unrequitedly in every wife should understand

FACTS ABOUT A VITAL PROBLEM

Safe new way in feminine hygiene gives continuous action for hours!

● Your happiness—your very health—can depend on whether or not you know the real facts about the vital problem of feminine hygiene!

Many women, who think they know, depend on out-dated or dangerous information . . . make the mistake of relying on weak, ineffective "home-made" mixtures . . . or risk using over-strong solutions of acids which can burn and injure delicate tissues.

Today modern, well-informed women everywhere have turned to Zonitors—the new, safe, convenient way in feminine hygiene.

Zonitors are dainty, snow-white suppositories which spread a greaseless, protective coating . . . and kill germs instantly at contact. Deodorize—not by temporarily masking—but by destroying odors. Cleanse antiseptically and give continuous medication for hours.

Yet Zonitors are safe for delicate tissues. Powerful—yet non-poisonous, non-caustic. Even help promote gentle healing. No apparatus; nothing to mix. At all druggists.

love with Deanna.

He doesn't go about making any nuisance of himself, or carrying one of those highly visible torches. But everybody of inner Hollywood knows his feelings. He has never married and he says unless he can have Deanna, he never will, despite his high eligibility and the number of other glamour girls who have pursued him.

Right now, with Deanna free, the situation gets more than ever ironic. Because Deanna still is not interested in him, save as a very good friend.

PITY FOR THE MOVIE BRIDE

Girls in love in other towns, girls dreamily in love with their fine new husbands, are much luckier than the movie brides. Juliet Capulet of Cupcake, Nebraska, has a very swell chance that she'll hold her Romeo. But the Hollywood brides can scarcely hold their happiness. They have their careers and they have their money, but their homes are very lonely.

Look at that haunted, hungry look on little Judy Garland's face, for example, just in case you don't believe me.

HAPPILY MARRIED IN HOLLYWOOD

There are two outstanding exceptions, however, one girl about the most provocative and charming young thing currently on screen, and the other a young American just returned from England's war zones. The first is Gene Tierney, who has just had her daughter, Antoinette Darcia Cassini, whom Gene and Oleg Cassini, her soldier-husband will call Toni.

When Gene married Olie more than two years ago, there was everything against their union, yet they have been blissful and grown steadily more devoted to one another.

Now that their first baby is born, Gene will return from Fort Riley, Kansas where she's been with her husband. She is not giving up her career, but she says she wants to have a family of six, at least.

Left—Together again. Now that Frances Langford is back from the Bob Hope overseas trip, she and husband Jon Hall are once more seen around town. Right—Mr. Bill Powell gives out with the look of all husbands of pretty wives when the pretty wife does a neat rumba, and the husband can't get it at all—and a handsome captain comes along who rumbas like a dream. Pretty wife is Diana Lewis, you know.

One of the many beauty aids offered by the House of Westmore is a perfect foundation cream. It gives you a lovely, attractive, natural beauty . . . goes on smoothly, and really stays on. It effectively hides tiny lines and blemishes . . . does not dry the skin because it contains lanolin . . . never gives you a "masked" feeling or appearance.

The Westmores—Perc, Wally and Bud—not only make-up the Hollywood stars, but have actually created the make-up with which they do it. ('CONTINUED FROM PAGE 10)

The other girl is Ann Dvorak. She's been away from the screen three years.. She left to follow her English husband, Leslie Fenton, when he went into the service of his native land. In England, Ann worked in an ambulance unit during the worst of the blitzes; was a member of the hard-laboring Women's Land Army; did camp and hospital entertainment tours in her few, free hours.

Now with Leslie invalided out of service and back to Hollywood, Ann's back, too. She means to return to the screen. But if Leslie should leave the film colony, for any reason whatsoever, Ann would leave also, even if she had the chance at a role as important as Scarlet O'Hara. For that's the way Ann loves her husband, the "whither thou goest, I shall go" feeling.

So some movie stars do know what marriage means, in the true sense of the word, but they are, I insist, exceptions.

WATCH THAT MAN—GREGORY PECK!

I may be wrong. I've been very wrong before, but I do believe I've seen the next great lasting star of the screen.

He's Gregory Peck, very tall, definitely dark with straight black hair, and handsome in a sensitive, distinctive way that makes him stand out even in a town populated with such as Gary Cooper, Cary Grant and Walter Pidgeon.

There are a lot of handsome new young men around Hollywood these days, of course, taking the place of the departed Gables, Taylors, Montgomerys and Matures. But Peck has the advantage not only of being new and very good looking, but also of being a magnificent actor.

I saw his love scenes in "Days of Glory," which Casey Robinson is making for R-K-O. This is another story of Russian guerrillas, but it is a simple, intense love story set against heroic action. Opposite Greg is Tamara Toumanova, straight from the Monte Carlo ballet and making her film debut.

I went to lunch with the three of them, Robinson, the excellent writer (he wrote the screen plays on "Kings Row," "Dark Victory," "Now, Voyager" and "This is

Movieland's NEW PICTURE GUIDE

THE NORTH STAR (Samuel Goldwyn) will disappoint all who had reason to expect a great deal more from Hollywood's first important drama of the war in Russia. That a producer of the standing of Samuel Goldwyn spent several million dollars in bringing "The North Star" to the screen gave promise of an outstanding cinema, as did the authorship of its story by a playwright of the reputation Lillian Hellman attained with such fine dramas as "Watch on the Rhine" and "The Little Foxes." What their collaboration brings forth this time is distinctly not up to standard.

The picture tells of life in a Russian village just before and during the first two days of the Nazi invasion. It gets off on the wrong foot by stressing the happy, carefree life these villagers led until even the children are forced to fight for their very lives. Unfortunately, the opening sequences are too much like comic opera to have any impact of reality. This spoils the force of the magnificent moments later depicted in all the harrowing details of war with a ruthless enemy.

In order to bring the grimness of the fighting closer home to Americans, the cast performs without accents. A notable film debut is scored by Farley Granger as one of the group of school children caught away from home by the Nazi attack. Other students in the party are well played by Anne Baxter, Dana Andrews, Jane Withers and little Eric Roberts. There are strong adult roles for Walter Huston, Ann Harding and Walter Brennan.

PARIS AFTER DARK (20th Century-Fox) rises above being simply another adventure in the underground forces of Nazi-occupied Europe. Somehow the things that occur in this melodrama have uncommon sincerity.

George Sanders, Philip Dorn, and Brenda Marshall give admirable performances as Parisians who are dangerously allied, trying to overthrow the Nazi rule of their country.

HI-YA SAILOR (Universal) is practically one solid tune. If you are mathematically inclined, you can count up to fifteen numbers in this little picture which features the orchestras of Ray Eberle and Wingy Manone. The answer to how it was done is simple. Donald Woods is cast as a songwriter in the Merchant Marine, and the slim plot tells of his search for a publisher. It's not too hard to take.

IN OLD OKLAHOMA (Republic) is a fast moving, action-packed drama of the early oil drilling days at the beginning of the twentieth century, when fortunes were made over night and Indians still had to be fought.

Martha Scott is an attractive school teacher who has written daringly and scandalously, for that era, about romance and adventure. With the protests of the town's offended petticoat delegation hissing her ingloriously but defiantly out of town, she meets Albert Dekker, a husky self-assured oil operator, and John Wayne, an itinerant cowboy and ex-Rough Rider.

What follows then is far more romantic than anything teacher wrote in her book! Plus some unexpected melodramatic "situations" into which she gets herself. Western backgrounds, fist fights, mustacheoed villains and all work with a plot that eventually gets to Washington and Teddy Roosevelt.

YOU'RE A LUCKY FELLOW, MR. SMITH (Universal) uses the marriage-of-convenience theme for an up-to-date light comedy with music. It is one of those minor offerings into which somehow eight songs have been packed. Allan Jones is a soldier who is tricked into marrying Evelyn Ankers because she has to become a bride by midnight in order to inherit a fortune.

WHISTLING IN BROOKLYN (MGM) doesn't give Red Skelton time to pucker up. Strictly a slapstick affair about a crime-solving radio star, known to his listeners as "The Fox," this is the third and latest of the series that introduced Skelton to the screen. It is also his weakest comedy. In attempts to hypo interest in the offering, the climaxing scenes are staged at the Brooklyn baseball park during a game in which "Dem Bums" participate. Actually since Brooklyn lost the pennant this year, only four of the players seen are still with the club, a fact that might serve as a warning to Skelton and others who appear with him.

GILDERSLEEVE ON BROADWAY (RKO) never makes up its mind whether it is bidding for laughs from the juvenile or the adult members of its audience. If Harold Peary, who is the Great Gildersleeve of radio programs, hopes to amuse the kids, his film material should not be so concerned with romantic mix-ups. If he wants to entertain the grown-ups, he will have to grow up first himself. Regrettably, Billie Burke has allowed herself to become involved in this unfunny affair.

FIND THE BLACKMAILER (Warners) could win the prize as the silliest murder mystery of the season. A detective is hired to locate a talking crow. For a finish, the writers seem to have decided that the bird couldn't talk, after all. The crow is a victim of a ventriloquist and the players are just victims of a hoax.

THE DANCING MASTERS (20th Century-Fox) has Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy tripping the light fantastic and incidentally themselves. You have to be a thorough-going addict of these comedians to deem them funny in this show. Both try hard, with merely moderate success.

Bing Crosby and the Andrews Sisters record "Pistol Packin' Mama" for Decca, plus "The Victory Polka" on the same disc. Dig that expression of Bing's!

Al Dexter, the "pistol packin'" man, tells Bing how he dreamed up that millions-selling hit tune.

WORDS of MUSIC

Hiya, pals. . . . Gather your wits around while I chop you out the best bit of music news this month—or a lot of months. It's this: Part of that fight between the A. F. of M. is settled and we can all get a few recordings again.

Good news? Wow!

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

Decca Records grab the spotlight because they were the first recording company to settle their differences with the American Federation of Musicians and thus were the first to be allowed to record with orchestras again. And the premier pressing after fourteen months of vocal backgrounds, old releases, etc., was made with great rejoicing and photographers galore on hand for the event. It's Bing Crosby and the Andrews Sisters doing "Pistol Packin' Mamma" and "The Victory Polka." Vic Schoen provides the arrangements and the music. The girls also have one platter all to themselves, "Down In The Valley" and "Shoo Shoo Baby."

On the quieter side there's a newie, Deanna Durbin with Victor Young and his orchestra on "Say A Prayer For The Boys Over There" and "The Spirit Of The Moment."

Save your allowances, gates, because Decca has big plans for lots of new records by their artists, including Jimmy Dorsey, Woody Herman and Frances Langford. . . .

Victor's new release is "Hotcha-cornia" and "Wild Wild Women" with that King of Corn, Spike Jones and His City Slickers. "Hotcha-cornia" is really "Dark Eyes" but not the way you've ever heard it before. . . .

Columbia Records' Xmas issue is not a swing record, but it's worth telling you about anyway. It's "Night Before Xmas" and "Little Jesus" rendered by Basil Rathbone with a beautiful background by the Robert Mitchell Boy Choir of St. Brendan's Church. . . .

Johnny Mercer and Hoagy Carmichael combined talents to compose "Old Music Master," which is the title of Capitol's latest. You'll get your money's worth because Paul Whiteman provides the music and the vocal department is handled by Mercer and Jack Teagarden, both Whiteman alumni. The only disappointment is that "Big T" doesn't play his horn. . . .

THE TUNEFILMS:

When it comes to tunes on celluloid the music makers continue to keep Hollywood on the upbeat, and the musicals are still coming. Twentieth Century-Fox' newest is "The Gang's All Here" and the most important part of the gang is Benny Goodman and his band. Of course, Alice Faye is starred (probably her last appearance before the newest member of the Phil Harris' household puts in his or her very welcome appearance), and for support Alice has such good supporters as Carmen Miranda, Jimmy Ellison, Charlotte Greenwood and Tony DeMarco. The picture has some fine numbers, the most effective of which are "Brazil" and "The Polka Dot Polka" (Cute title, yes?). Carmen does "Brazil" as only she can do it, accompanied by her own band. B.G. drops his clarinet for a few bars to join her vocally on a tune called "Paducah," and he sings a solo, "Minnie's In The Money."

Fox has just started production on one of their biggest efforts, "Four Jills In a Jeep" (formerly titled "Camp Show") with Dick Haymes, no less, in the male lead. He will sing three new songs with Jimmy Dorsey and his band supplying the music. Bob Eberly will be in evidence, too. This is the story of the trip which Carole Landis, Kay Francis, Mitzi Mayfair and Martha Raye took to the fighting fronts, and the girls will play themselves. . . .

If you're a Ted Lewis fan, be sure to see Columbia's "Is Everybody Happy?", the story of Ted's life and career. Nan Wynn is in this, also Bob Haymes, Dick's younger brother. It's nice actually to see Nan singing for a change. We've only heard her before—as Rita Hayworth's voice double. There is a fine array of "oldie but goodie" tunes in this film, including all the ones Ted made famous. . . .

Universal's "Hi Ya Sailor" features Ray Eberle and Wingy Manone and his band. Ray sings "Just A Step Away From Heaven," and Wingy has a number called "Jazz Babies Ball," which he does in typical Manone manner.

In "Crazy House," starring Olsen and Johnson, you're going to see your old friends, "The Glenn Miller Singers," who are actually nobody else but "The Modernaires" and Marion Hutton. They are heavily featured along with Count Basie and his orchestra. And remember Leighton Noble, who was doing all right with his band when the war came along? He plays a straight role besides making with song. Also present and accounted for are Martha O'Driscoll, warbling on the screen for the first time, and the Delta Rhythm Boys. . . .

Metro - Goldwyn - Mayer's "Mr. Co-Ed" is still shooting, though Harry James has finished his chores and started rehearsing for "Two Sisters and a Sailor." He expects to be called into the army as soon as it's completed. . . .

RKO certainly did right by our boy Frank Sinatra in "Higher and Higher." He plays himself in the picture, wins a beautiful girl, Barbara Hale, and sings five songs—"You Belong In A Love Song," "The Music Stopped," "Lovely Way To Spend An Evening," "I Couldn't Sleep A Wink Last Night" and "I Saw You First." How about those titles? When he sings them you can readily tell that they were written just for him.

EARMARKS OF HITS:

Phil Moore, the brilliant Negro pianist and arranger, has written a jump tune which will be one of the biggest hits of the year. It's "Shoo Shoo, Baby," and one of the cutest songs I've ever heard. I had the chance to hear Lena Horne rehearse—before she sang it on her personal appearance at the Capitol Theatre in New York. It brought down the house there and it sure laid me in the aisles. You'll also hear it in Universal's "Three Cheers For The Boys" and probably every time you turn on your radio. . . .

"White Christmas" undoubtedly will be revived every Yuletide season from now on, but this year it will have some competition from a new song by Kim Gannon and Walter Kent, "I'll Be Home For Christmas." This is a fine sentimental ballad as you can see from its last line, "I'll Be Home For Christmas, If Only In My Dreams," and if I know my releases, it stands an excellent chance of being a smash hit.

Frankie Masters introduced a novelty ditty which should make the Hit Parade ere too long—"Deacon Jones," all about a handsome deacon who's a killer with the gals. . . .

Allie Wrubel's "I Bet-cha" is a swingy thingy that should get someplace. . . . "From Twilight Till

The fabulous Miss Rogers with "Lady in the Dark" all finished at Paramount and awaiting release (and it's whispered that it is utterly super) has returned to her home studio, RKO, for "Tender Comrade." This is a touching story of a war bride, and Ginger being one herself, is playing it with her suave dash and perfection. Leading man Robert Ryan is adding extra realism, too, this being his final film before army induction.

Not long ago, it was predicted that Ingrid Bergman would become the foremost actress on the screen. In a few short years, she has justified that claim.

Ingrid at nine months, and giving with a great big smile. Too young then to be treating the customers, that grin was probably just to please the cameraman.

Four years old, and going musical. Matter of fact, it was a song which was responsible for Ingrid's coming to America; the title song from "Intermezzo."

Every man who ever meets Ingrid Bergman starts talking like a love song; and our author, as you will see from this magnificent story, is no exception whatsoever

BERGMAN, the Beautiful

By JOSEPH HENRY STEELE

SOMETIMES I think she's the most beautiful woman I have ever seen. I'm not sure. How can one be sure of such a complete and final conclusion?

The thought disturbs me, and has disturbed me ever since I first met her. Her kind of beauty is always disturbing. Ordinary definitions don't touch it. Like trying to explain in a hundred words the vast and complex nature of radium rays.

In the twenty years I have been in Hollywood I've witnessed a meager procession of beautiful women: Alice Joyce, Katherine MacDonald, Corinne Griffith, Barbara LaMarr, Vilma Banky—a few others. But Bergman is of different stuff. Beauty—not of a Grecian profile or flaming hair or seductive figure.

Let's see what this beauty is made of; what are its symptoms. Several years ago, when Ingrid Bergman was a strange name to the American public, David O. Selznick predicted that one day she would become the foremost actress on the screen. Later, and not long ago, the famed producer of "Gone With The Wind" and "Rebecca," to whom she is now under contract, declared without qualification that Bergman would play Maria in "For Whom The Bell Tolls" and, moreover, would win the Academy Award by her performance. He persisted in this prognostication even after another actress had started to essay the role.

What rare human compound was this which so arrested the discoverer of Vivien Leigh, Joan Fontaine, Jennifer Jones, and many others? What is the anatomy of this beauty?

Shyly demure, for all her nine years, here we see the start of the Bergman reserve; the unaffected simplicity of her, which is more frankly appealing than the usual Hollywood glamour.

Grandma's specs make the five-year-old Ingrid rather a precocious child. Reading the news at that age, and with such serious concentration? Oh, but she's only pretending!

In a scene from a Swedish film. Ingrid's dramatic career was underway in Sweden at the age of fifteen. And successfully, we can add assuredly.

Bergman teamed with Cooper again, as they appear in a scene for "Saratoga Trunk," scheduled for release sometime in 1944.

Author Joseph H. Steele meets Ingrid for the first time, greeting her at Great Northern Station, in Minnesota.

BERGMAN

Carl Sandburg, world famous writer, met his favorite film heroine when he visited Ingrid on the set of "Gaslight," her latest picture.

MY first meeting with Ingrid Bergman was last February in Minneapolis. She was arriving there from her home in Rochester, N. Y., and I had never seen her except on the screen. She was coming there at the behest of the government to make a film about Swedes in America for the Office of War Information. It was a warm day for last February's Minneapolis—only eighteen below zero—and I was one of a delegation greeting her.

Presently the train arrived, and Bergman emerged—without benefit of fanfare and minus a retinue of fourteen pieces of luggage. Several passengers alighted, and behind them she appeared. Dressed in low-heeled shoes, a fur coat, her head encased in a red and blue knit bonnet secured by a knot under the chin. The latter was her very practical and attractive solution to the problem presented by the haircut she wore as a result of "For Whom the Bell Tolls."

I stepped forward and greeted her. "I am Joe Steele," I said. Simply, frankly, warmly she looked at me. Later I was to learn that nothing so characterizes as this way of looking at someone. The word "straight" kept recurring to me. "Hello," she said. But how can I describe how she said it?

"The press would like to photograph you here," I said. "And then they'd like to take some pictures in the U.S.O. room upstairs. Do you mind?" (Continued on page 72)

Ingrid Bergman and Warner Baxter in a scene from Columbia's "Adam Had Four Sons". Her success in this country was still to be established. Her charm was in being different; real, sincere.

The role she played with Humphrey Bogart, in "Casablanca", was so like Ingrid really is: forthright, honest, direct and unaffected, to the point of seeming naive.

WITH FRANK SINATRA IN HOLLYWOOD

Or How the Idol of the Slick Chicks Feels About His Newest Triumphs

IN October, 1943, the number of Frank Sinatra Fan Clubs, covering the entire country, and strictly feminine in membership, reached an even eight hundred.

"The Sighing Society of Sinatra Swooners" meets in New Jersey and starts each session with the countersign, a low breathing of the words "Moonlight Sinatra," followed by three short sighs and a long one. Its members are teen-agers.

In Manhattan there is the "Frank Sinatra Fan and Mah Jong Club," which meets to kick the gong and the ivory-pieces around simultaneously, to the tune of his records. The ladies so organized range from forty to sixty years of age.

"The Girls Who Would Lay Down Their Lives and Die for Frank Sinatra Club" will perform the supreme sacrifice, if demanded, in Flatbush, N. Y.

pockets. One of the Slaves claims to have seen "Ship Ahoy," in which Frankie sang two songs, one hundred and twenty times. Since the picture was undoubtedly double-featured, this gives rise to the dire thought that maybe the Civil War didn't do as much freeing as we thought it did.

Then again, there's the "Sin Not Sinatra Club," composed of young ladies who frankly admit that if they can't have Frankie, they don't want anybody, which—with the man shortage being what it is—may turn out to be a good thing.

At any rate, it all adds up to the fact that next to World War II, a small guy named Sinatra is the biggest thing that's hit American womanhood since she got the vote. There are some people who would qualify this statement by adding that if it were not for World War II, this particular type of hysteria could not have swept a nation.

To be absolutely fair, any American, male or female, croon-crazy or not, must admit that in a decade when a couple of other little fellows—Hitler and Tojo, by name—do nothing but create suffering, Frank Sinatra, who makes a nation sing-happy, deserves some of the frenzied plaudits he is getting.

Moved by this same spirit of fairness, we are pleased to announce the number of Frank Sinatra Fan Clubs has now increased to eight hundred and one. Just a few weeks ago the "We're Willing to Be Broadminded About Sinatra Club" came into being. Its charter membership consisted of Miss Ruth Waterbury, editor of this magazine, plus the above signed writer, both of whom don't mind admitting they are feminine but refuse to tell their ages.

This latest and smallest group, we believe, is the only Sinatra Club composed strictly of Bing Crosby fans, which as you know, is a breed of partisan even stubborner than a Republican. The immediate circumstances preceding its organization occurred one morning when the staff of MOVIELAND, missing Miss Waterbury, found her sitting dazedly beside a snowdrift of Sinatra fan-mail. In her nerveless hand was clutched a missive signed by some twenty females, reading:

"We love Frankie so much we don't care if he is married. We love his wife, too, and all his unborn children—"

Our first actual glimpse of the Croon Prince occurred at RKO, where they were starring him in a picture called "Higher and Higher," after the career of the same name. He was walking down a graveled pathway, a slim, grease-painted and tuxedoed figure, sort of pulled along by two large men at either elbow and with three more pushing forward at his heels. A man on one side was saying something about the afternoon's filming schedule, the fellow on the other side was talking about a broadcast rehearsal, and one of the heel-steppers was trying to drown out the others by yelling something about a Canteen appearance that night.

The most overpowering current of personality radiated by the nation's idol at that moment was a strong aura of daze. Our very first encounter with the famous voice without its choral accompaniment, was a short sentence that said something like "Hello glad to know you tell the band I'll meet them there at eight."

The fore-part of the statement we took as our very own, and let the rest of it fall where it would do the most good. His eyes, made bluer by the greasepaint, were friendly, and the Sinatra smile, while it lasted, was of a sufficient warmth to leave us undismayed, even though Frankie, carried onward by the flying wedge, was off across the lot and we were left standing in the middle of the graveled pathway with his friend and alter ego, a gentleman named George Evans.

"Gee," said Mr. Evans feelingly, "if you had any idea of the merry-go-round that kid's been on! Eight months of it, just like this—trying to do a dozen things at once, day and night. Any other fellow would have lost thirty pounds—"

"How much has Frankie lost?" we asked, with a mind for statistics.

"Nothing," said Mr. Evans gloomily. "He was nothing but skin and bones (Continued on page 63)

THEIR FINEST Christmas PRESENTS

IT WAS Christmas Eve, 1940, a foggy night with rain in the wind. Rosalind Russell emerged from M-G-M Studios with that hard-pressed feeling. Christmas is the silly season! Why do we work ourselves into fevers trying to find things other people don't want?

Late as it was, autograph hunters waited under the street lamps. One little fellow of six or seven, shivering in a shabby sweater, saw Roz and came running. "Merry Christmas!" he cried joyously, thrust something into her hand and ran away. It was a penny.

"I never had a gift that touched me more," said the star.

That same Christmas of 1940 is the one best remembered by Annabella and Tyrone Power.

BY TERENCE KENNEDY

AFTER nearly a year in California, during which time I finished the novel on which I was working, I decided to go East for a few weeks' change and rest. Needless to say, when I reached New York, the first person I 'phoned was Katina.

"You couldn't have come at a more opportune moment," she greeted me. "You who have been to California—you are just the person to advise me."

Of course, all this was said in Katina's usually excited way. And without giving me any further explanation, she commanded me to appear toute-de-suite at her hotel. Somehow I couldn't understand why having been in California put me in a position to advise her, but without wasting time on speculations, I started out toute-de-suite as I was told.

"Tell him to come up," Katina's voice echoed through the 'phone when the desk clerk announced that I was in the hall.

A bell-hop conducted me to an elaborate apartment where he told me Madame would see me presently. "Are you sure this is—" I stopped myself in time. Probably all those tales of Katina's hardship were pure invention. Or perhaps Katina had somehow at last managed to effect the release of some of her wealth from Greece. I was still pondering over the source of this terrific affluence when Katina burst into the room, her arms loaded with stacks of photographs and books. She was followed by a hotel maid, carrying two vases of flowers and boxes of cigarettes. "Hello, darling," she called to me, as if she had seen me the day before.

I watched her while she hurried about the room, placing a photograph here, a neat pile of books there, the while instructing the maid where to place the flowers and cigarettes. I noticed that she was much thinner. She wore a wine-colored velvet house coat which fitted tightly around her slender body. Her thick coal-black hair was thrown carelessly off her forehead. Her cheeks were slightly sunken, and she was very pale. But the fire in her eyes belied these signs.

"There now," she said finally, looking about her contentedly. "The apartment looks lived in."

"But isn't it?" I asked.

"By me?" she laughed. "Goodness no. The management only lent it to me for an hour. Tommy and I share a little room down the hall." Questions were bouncing around in my brain. What had Katina been living on? Who was Tommy? What of her future? How had she survived here in America? I got no chance to ask one of them, for the 'phone rang. "Yes, yes," Katina called into it, "tell them to come up."

She whirled on me, "This is what I wanted to see you about—you who know Hollywood. These men who are coming are from the Paramount Studio. They want me to test for the role of 'Pilar' in 'For Whom the Bell Tolls.' "

" 'Pilar!' " I exclaimed. "Why every actress in Hollywood wants to play 'Pilar!' "

"That's why I'm so frightened. Why should I, who have never seen a camera, be chosen?"

Katina Paxinou

"Because you are a great actress," I said to encourage her.

"There are great actresses who are starving in the world," she answered. "Besides, I'm not a great actress. I only know and understand the characters I portray. Oh, how I understand 'Pilar.' She is in my blood. You must remember my ancestors were guerrillas in Crete. And like Hemingway's 'Pilar' they were rough—but inside they possessed the nobility of Kings."

She saw me looking sceptically at her trim figure.

"You can't imagine me as 'Pilar,' eh?" she smiled. " 'Pilar' was a big woman, you are thinking. That is the first thing these gentlemen are going to say when they see me, but I will tell them what I tell you—it is first here where 'Pilar' is big." She tapped her breast. "The rest is a question of makeup."

As Katina had predicted, I noticed the faces of the three men drop as they entered and saw her. They exchanged astonished glances, but after Katina assured them that she was indeed the Katina Paxinou, they shrugged their shoulders and sat down. After all, they were only carrying out orders from Hollywood and the responsibility was not theirs. They showed her a sketch of the "Pilar" they had in mind.

Katina snorted. "This is not 'Pilar.' This is the 'Golem' made up to resemble a mongolian gypsy."

In my timid way I must say I agreed with her. The sketch suggested anything but a Spanish peasant.

The man who was to direct the test showed interest for the first time. "How would you have her look?"

"Like a woman who has seen better days, and whose bravery and devotion to the cause leaves no time for fancy dress," Katina began enthusiastically. "Hemingway wrote that 'many men had loved her.' So the actress who plays 'Pilar' must give some impression of a past charm and fascination. He also wrote, 'she is all woman'. Therefore," she added, pointing to the sketch, "she couldn't have been this Frankenstein."

The Director seemed pleased. "We will take you to the costumers tomorrow morning and you can choose your own costume. Now, about the test—which scene have you chosen?"

"Ah," Katina smiled, "I was about to mention that. I will only make a silent test (Continued on page 75)

Wallace Beery in a scene from Paramount's "Fireman Save My Child," a sympathetic role of the type his public demands for him. He's been acting since he was nineteen, has made three hundred pictures.

Synopsis PART I

Will Wally marry again? The star who has been one of the very few to make the transition from silent movies to talkies, without losing popularity, who is known as the world's highest paid actor, has had success in everything but marriage. Fans who remember his two previous romantic experiences—with the dark-haired, blue-eyed girl later renamed Gloria Swanson, whom he started in pictures and then made his wife, to be divorced from her in 1920; and with Rita Gilman, his second wife, also divorced—they are all speculating now whether Beery will try a third marriage, with the Texas pretty, Aurella Nawracki. Will she bring him the happiness he so very much deserves, and has missed?

BY LUPTON A. WILKINSON

IN 1942 Wally Beery went to Johns Hopkins, Baltimore's great medical university and hospital, for a minor operation. When they handed him his bill, on departure day, he frowned.

"Where," he inquired, "is the surgeon's fee?"

"There isn't any."

Wally at once demanded the way to "the Doc's" office.

The Doc, it happened, used to be one of Vienna's greatest surgeons. He listened with a twinkle while Wally explained that he always paid his way, while he stammered, "Save your for-free work for cases that need it. Not that I don't appreciate—"

"This is a personal indulgence," the Viennese smiled.

Louise Fazenda, and the Beery fans cheered in the movies of 1918, when he was making good on the old Keystone lot.

"There are two men in the world who have put so much pleasure into my life, during many years, that I could never accept money from them."

Wally felt embarrassed. Then he grew curious, and couldn't help asking,

"Who's the other fellow?"

"Clark Gable."

They almost had to put Wally back on the operating table. A red-hot Gable fan, both as to screen work and off-screen personality, he thought it was very nearly irreligious to compare him with Clark. "Why—why—" he stammered, "he's handsome!"

"That's fine for the ladies," the surgeon replied. "But you and Gable both have something that appeals to men, women and children alike. Something that seems more valuable today than ever before in history. It's sincerity."

Wally doesn't know there's anything special about his loyalty and sincere quality. What's "corn" to many people is to him merely the right way of life. Like Popeye, he is what he is.

For instance, on the set of "Rationing" I asked, "Tell me something of your mother, Wally. Wally was silent a long minute, knitting his brows over what to say. Then—very slowly he said, "All that I am I owe to my mother."

How many people do you know who are unselfconscious enough to speak that line!

Wally's Mom was a hard-working woman, in the old frame house at 18th and Paseo Streets, Kansas City, Mo. There were three boys, and Pop's salary (except on the rare occasion when the Republicans won an election and he got promoted from Patrolman to Police Captain) normally ran about eighty dollars a month. Each Saturday night Mrs. B. substracted from Patrolman Beery's pocket enough money to buy music lessons for her boys. At fifty cents an hour.

The lessons couldn't have been much, but the sacrifice was genuine. Countless mothers have drawn neighborhood laughs for similar sacrifices. Yet the determination of the Kansas City Patrolman's wife that her boys should have something in the way of "cultural education" was to help raise Wally's name in stardom's electric lights—on Broadway—at 21.

Music was the only lesson this fast-growing, superenergetic boy liked. So far as he now remembers, he completed only the fourth grade. In the Beery home a boy either went to school or worked. Wally's first jobs were: furnace tender in a steel mill, $5 a week; engine wiper for the Santa Fe, $6 a week; member of a track repair crew, $7 a week. These jobs held his attention, but not all of it, from 12 years to 16. He frequently would run away and "ride the rods" down into the Ozark mountains, or even north to Chicago. Then he'd miss his Mom and come back, to hard work—and music lessons.

There is no doubt that the restlessness in her son caused Mrs. Beery deep worry. When the elder brother, Bill, became manager of Forepaugh-Sells circus, Mom said, "Take the boy along with you. At least you can keep an eye on him." So Wally became the first youngster ever to have circus life prescribed as a "reform" measure.

Today in Wyoming, Utah and San Fernando Valley, California, cowboys will tell you that Wally has a remarkable knack for handling animals. "They understand him, and he knows and likes them, cussedness and all," one puncher put it. That became obvious the first day Wally walked into Forepaugh-Sells' elephant tent. Before he was seventeen, he had charge of eighteen "bulls"—the circus man's term for all elephants. Meanest of all was Topsy (Wally says, "An elephant never forgets—to be mean"); yet Topsy was mortally frightened to ride on a train at night. (Continued on page 66)

WHAT I HOPE MARRIAGE IS WHAT I KNOW MARRIAGE TO BE

by

Dame May Whitty

(As told to Eleanor Harris)

DICK QUINE and I are being married as soon as time and the Coast Guard permit. And I know it will be my only marriage, and it will last forever. I also know that it will be a complete success. In fact, it will be wonderful!

There's a reason for my assurance—and his name is Quine. You see, I've always searched for just six things in a future husband. I wanted a man who was good, who was kind, who didn't drink, who was completely honest, who wanted a family, and who dominated me. In my whole life, which is twenty-two years, I have found only one man who owned those six qualities, and I'm going to marry him. We can't fail to make each other happy.

It's funny, but when I tell people what I wanted in a husband (and found), they always say, "But how amazing! You haven't mentioned looks, social position, or money!" Well, why should I? I don't have looks, social position, or money myself. Besides, I know that all those things can disappear—because they've disappeared in my own family. In one stroke, my mother's family lost their money and she lost her husband; and she found herself working in a store for many years to support my brother and myself. So naturally those material things didn't interest me. I was looking for what could never, never change.

But to get back to my reason for knowing that our marriage cannot miss. I know my future husband like a book, and he knows me. I know him a thousand times better than most girls know their future husbands —for the simple reason that he's lived for a year now in the same apartment house my mother and I live in, which my mother manages. During that year he's had breakfast, lunch, and dinner with us every day. Obviously I've seen him for more hours and in more moods than the average girl would, and probably one hundred per cent more than the current war brides. I know far more about him than the facts that he's six feet three, blond, once-married, twenty-four years old, and wears his clothes well. I know everything about his personality and character—and, most of all, I know that he has the ability to dominate me intelligently.

Susan and her Richard Quine, together as sweethearts in "Tish." This is one screen romance that happens to be the real thing!

I KNOW marriage to be the most ideal, the most practical, the most amusing, and the most tender of human relationships. It can be any of those things at any time, or all of those things simultaneously.

Yet I believe our laws on marriage should be changed. I think it should be harder to get married and easier to get divorced. I believe this because I feel if marriage is not absolutely complete, it is damaging to the human soul.

In fifty-one years of ideally happy marriage I have learned many lessons, and of these there are two very great lessons that I realize I must first master.

The most important is that love must be earned. Love is a growing thing. With cultivation, it will grow into steadily greater beauty. With neglect, it will die.

The second is that too many people make a god of sex. Young people may not believe this, but I know now that the mind has more to do with creating a happy marriage than has the body. But to have an ideal marriage, the mind, the soul, and the body must be united.

I do not regard myself as a remotely perfect wife. I am not even sure that I am a good one. Of this I am sure, however. I would not have stayed married for more than half a century if it hadn't been that I married an angel. A year ago when Ben and I celebrated our golden anniversary, we appeared together on a radio program. At the time I told this truth to the script writer who was creating our speeches. "I married an angel," I announced to him firmly.

When Ben and I actually got on the air and were reading our scripts, I discovered Ben had been given this speech to say about me, and like the angel he is, he did say it.

Nothing could be less true. I was in 1890, and I still am, a strong-willed, short-tempered woman who wanted her own way, but was a little afraid of taking it—who desired a career above all things, who fought militantly for women's rights. Fighting militantly for women's rights simply was not done in 1890, and there must have been hours when Ben was very much embarrassed by my boldness. I'm sure he must have suffered

Ben Webster as "Sir Lancelot," when they were calling him the "Watteau barrister." And it's Dame May Whitty, as she was then.

More than that, we know each other's working-personalities. We met a year and a half ago while making the movie "Tish," and we've seen each other through a handful of roles ever since. While I was acting in "Random Harvest," "Russia," "Assignment in Brittany," and a couple of Dr. Gillespie pictures; and while he was acting in "Babes on Broadway," "For Me and My Gal," "The Human Comedy," and "Stand By For Action." Also, we were brought up in the same city—Hollywood, though he was born in Detroit and I in Spokane. But none of this is what matters. What matters is that we know each other completely, and nothing that could come up in marriage would surprise or dismay us.

Therefore I know exactly what our life together will be like. I know that we'll live in a small, informal house furnished with French provincial furniture—which Dick and I have been buying together for the past year at auctions. I know that we'll have two servants and a brood of children and a healthy, happy, quiet life together.

Luckily, we both have exactly the same idea of the Good Life: outdoors all day long, to bed at ten o'clock, and up with the dawn. Neither of us likes parties or nightclubs—perhaps because neither of us drinks. Both of us love sports—tennis, golfing, riding, swimming. We can't get enough of them, except on Sundays when there are too many other people doing all those things, too. So on Sundays you'll find us working in our garden, eating an early supper (which Dick will cook, because I neither know how nor care how, and he loves cooking)—and then you'll find us planted happily in front of the radio at seven-thirty sharp to hear the Hermit's Cave. Until Dick went into the Coast Guard a few months ago, we hadn't missed listening to those three horror stories for a whole year, sitting paralyzed with attention in Mother's living room.

And while we listen, I'll be sewing. In the past year, I've made one hooked rug and half of a petit-point one, while we sat glued to our pet radio programs. I'll continue that in our own home when we're married. And Dick says we'll continue reading, too—only I'll be reading something more than murder mysteries! Dick's the intellectual of this pair, you see; and while I've been devouring "Who Killed Annie Bowers?" he's been buried in ponderous tomes on art. He predicts that after we're Mr. and Mrs. Richard Quine, however, I too will be reading books on art, literature, and politics. And he's also announced that we'll each make book reports, and exchange them every night. (Frankly, this is the one part of our married life which seems a little hazy to me! I just can't see myself digesting great volumes, and then writing reports on them! But still —time will tell.)

Dick'll run everything—me and the house, too. But always intelligently, always tactfully, always including me in every decision. The house will be apple-pie neat because of him, not because of me. Not that I'm sloppy about my clothes or hair or (Continued on page 86)

when I became a true militant suffragette in those pleasant days before the First World War. Yet Ben let me do as I desired because—well, as I have said, he is an angel.

I have never understood the miracle of his falling in love with me, but I shall be forever grateful for it. Ben was a barrister then, what you in America call a lawyer, and he was the handsomest man in London. In fact they called him the "Watteau barrister," so aristocratic was his handsomeness. Beautiful creatures were always hurling themselves at him, yet when his sister introduced us at the St. James Theater where I was playing, a gleam came into his eye which is still there when he looks at me.

Ben Webster spent the next seven years courting me. I truly did not wish to be married. I had "dedicated" myself to the theater and had gone on the stage when I was fifteen. Giving up parties, giving up beaux, giving up all the things young girls usually cherish, made me feel positively holy, convinced me that I had a true vocation. That vocation was the stage and all the discomforts that went with it, back there in the Eighties.

I started in "The Mountain Sylph" and was a chorus girl, really. They called me "little Whitty" and babied me for that first season. And later, when I went touring, I never noticed the hardships. I have played as many as fourteen parts in twelve nights in twelve different towns. We were frequently cold and hungry, without lodgings. Sometimes we played in theaters where the snow fell straight into our dressing rooms. But it was all romance to me, and all I asked from life.

Ben's grandfather had been a very famous actor-manager, and when Ben realized that I was determined to go on with my work, his acting blood asserted itself, and he deserted the law. He, too, became an actor. He was so handsome and so fine a performer that he became an immediate success. He was leading man for Mrs. Pat Campbell. He worked with the Irvings and with Ellen Terry. But he kept on courting me, and finally I could no longer resist him.

I went through then what many a Hollywood bride goes through now. I was a plain woman married to a god-like male. Other women fell instantaneously and constantly in love with my husband. Yet I determined not to be possessive, not to be insistent, not to be full of claims. Two tremendous things we possessed in common; our very similar thoughts and points of view, our common laughter. I hoped those would be the safeguards of our marriage. We always worked together, and we would rehearse our roles, one with the other, and read plays and books.

Thus I never knew a moment's jealousy of Ben. What I should have done if he had been a different kind of man, if he had given me cause for jealousy, I blessedly never had to find out. But I learned another truth: trust which implies freedom of thought and action binds lovers more closely than any "rights" or demands ever can.

There were many seasons when we could each have bettered our careers by separating, but we refused to do that. Daniel Frohman, the (Continued on page 90)

THIS IS

I REMEMBER:

A half-eaten apple in the road before my first school, and how a classmate picked it up and ate it, swaggering before a companion and myself to show how tough he was; how we were summoned to the principal's office several days later to be confronted with the young tough's mother in tears. Her offspring, in the hospital with appendicitis, had "confessed" that we had made him eat the dirty apple, and she wanted to see the two villains. At least for once we were not guilty!

Being teacher's pride and joy only in drawing class, but my greatest artistic successes came when teacher left the room, and I drew for the benefit of classmates.

Sideburns. When I first started acting, I wore them in a lot of period pictures. I'll never forget the time I had a week's leave in New York and couldn't shave off the sideburns because I hadn't time to grow others when I got home. I went around the big town looking like an actor and being horribly self-conscious.

Here's Gary doing a scene for "The Real Glory." "But I'm not like the men I impersonate," he says.

A role such as "The Westerner" with Doris Davenport is old home week to Coop, the Montana man.

MYSELF

I LIKE:

Kids, either sex; people who do things; that Sabino horse I rode in "The Westerner"; the smell of sagebrush in hot sun; long telephone conversations, if the right party is on the other end of the line.

Food. I can eat anything. Tartar steak and wild duck are my favorites — well-cooked outside, but cooked quickly so that they are rare inside. But give me anything, so long as it's food. I had jaundice in '31, and I still remember how good food looked and smelled, but when I'd had a couple of bites, I couldn't swallow more. I thought then that once back to normal, I'd never care what I ate, so long as I ate. And I don't.

Good looking clothes, well tailored. I guess it's that old Indian instinct for wild colors, but I like to take two or three strong vivid shades that harmonize or contrast sharply and combine them.

I DON'T LIKE:

Baby talk from those only too evidently out of the kindergarten class; nightclubs every night; worrying;

Recognize the little dark-skin gal with Gary in "Northwest Mounted Police?" Paulette Goddard, no less.

Ernest Hemingway wrote "Robert Jordan" in "For Whom the Bell Tolls" exclusively for Gary. After he'd seen Bergman, he decided she was the "Maria" he's dreamed of, too.

Best friends and favorite co-stars. In "Bluebeard's Eighth Wife" Claudette Colbert discovered what a fine dancer Gary is.

doing silly things simply because it's expected of you.

IF I'D THOUGHT OF IT IN TIME:

I'd have been a doctor instead of an actor. I'm pretty good at doing things with my hands, and I'm intensely interested in surgery. On a ranch there's always a certain amount of accidents, injuries to man or beast, creatures being born, and so on, and you learn to deal with emergencies before a doctor arrives.

This doctor in Mr. DeMille's picture "The Story of Dr. Wassell" is tops. He's a real American country doctor from Arkansas, as traditional as Abe Lincoln, the kind of man we like to think of as representative of America.

I'M ALWAYS INTERESTED IN:

Books by foreign correspondents or by people who know their background and understand current events and personalities they deal with in accounts of countries involved in this war. Lots of good stuff has come out of the Far East as well as that from European correspondents.

Traveling.

Anything new in medicine, surgery, or modern miracles of science.

Mystery stories.

I ENJOY:

Symphonic music, some of it; swing; sentimental old ballads; Irish songs; some of the current hit songs. I twist the dial on my car radio and listen to whatever comes out.

Football and baseball, but I'm not a rabid fan. I usually see several games a season, but wouldn't lose any sleep if I didn't get the latest scores.

Light pictures. I enjoyed doing the gambler in "Saratoga Trunk" because it's a nice, light part after more sombre roles.

I'VE LEARNED:

That if I get all dressed up and go to a big shindig, I'd better be ready to sign (Continued on page 88)

Sonja and husband Captain Dan Topping of the United States Marine Corps. Like any other war wife, she followed him to camp.

SONJA HENIE

"An American Wife"

Looking like newlyweds, after three years! Too happy to make the headlines, they still make love.

BY JOSEPH WECHSBERG

A COUPLE of years ago someone suggested that the story of Sonja Henie's next picture be based on her life.

The front office moguls turned the idea down cold. "People would never believe it," they said. They were right.

The story of the little Norwegian girl who became her native country's national idol and then the world's greatest sports attraction; this girl who became Queen of the Ice, adored by Kings, Princes, Presidents, dictators, and then invaded Hollywood to be a full-fledged star in her first picture, a picture that earned over two million dollars—that story sounded too good to be true. People got so used to Sonja's proverbial success that they weren't surprised that her new picture broke all box office records. She then fell in love, in a most successful manner, and married a handsome millionaire—one of those sharp-profile, pipe-sucking dream boys who seem to exist only in moving pictures.

Then came the war. The Nazis captured Norway, and like other Norwegian families, the Henie's lost all their native-land investments, their home. In America, war touched Sonja even closer. Dan Topping, her rich husband, enlisted in the Marines. It broke the absolute flawlessness of Sonja's life pattern into small bits.

But the way Sonja has reacted to it all, become "An American Wife" as she now proudly calls herself, become a business woman as well as a glamorous athlete—well, that's this story.

An ordinary day begins this autumn of 1943, with Sonja breakfasting in her Beverly Hills home on coffee and a biscuit. ("I can't eat when I work," she explains.) She glances over some business letters, calls up half a dozen people in as many different American cities, sends wires to her business associates in Chicago and New York, devises a new dance routine for her forthcoming show, makes a decision involving thousands of dollars, drives out to the Twentieth Century-Fox Studios, spends six strenuous hours doing loops, spirals, and spreads in front of the camera, goes home, takes a massage, puts on a dress (or more likely a suit, since she prefers suits), greets her husband who just arrived on leave from his camp, and they go out for dinner and a couple of dances maybe. If you ask her how she does it all and keeps perfectly healthy, she looks at you with her big brown eyes and says in her husky, energetic contralto voice, "That's my working mood."

She has another side, however. And when her work permits it, she loves to be lazy. A few months ago, she took a tiny house at Quantico, Va., and later at Cherry Point, N. C., near the Marine Air Corps station where her husband, Captain Dan Reid Topping, was then on duty. They took one side of a double cottage. Unable to get any help and eager to be no exception among the other Marine officer wives, Sonja Henie, millionaire girl, got up at six in the morning, learned to cook, wash, keep house, and enjoyed it immensely—especially when Dan said, "Honey, those are the best muffins I've ever tasted."

"She came back with all her nails broken," her mother says.

"It was swell, and I'm going to do it again," Sonja comments.

But at work, as for instance on the set of her new picture "Wintertime," she is not only star, but also technical adviser, associate production manager, second cameraman, assistant director.

When Sonja made her first picture, "One In A Million," the studio people resented her giving orders, displaying Garboish whims and showing a dangerous independence. She didn't like to wait between takes while the lights had to be adjusted. She wanted to be the permanent center of interest. She got in very wrong in many quarters. But since then Sonja has learned that movie-making is a process of cooperation; and the experts have learned that Sonja knows best about skating and let her handle all the skating sequences. Thus a happy atmosphere reigns.

I talked to her on the set, and the scene I saw shooting called for Sonja to swing up into the center of the rink and go into a hair-raising spin, faster and faster, while white clouds descended upon her, finally making her disappear.

They marked the exact spot where she would spin. The piano started playing, the (Continued on page 85)

SHE LEARNED ABOUT LIFE WITH FATHER

Beautiful, blonde Louise Allbritton tells what she discovered about dollars and sense from her dad

BY ALICE L. TILDESLEY

IT WASN'T until Louise Allbritton, Universal's tall, blonde discovery, was earning her own living that she realized that her father was less than a meanie and a miser about money.

Up to that time, there had been an off-again, on-again feud about finances between high-pockets Louise and her dad, L. L. Allbritton, Texas owner of cattle ranches, oil fields, and operator of extensive transportation systems.

Mr. Allbritton believed that the moment a child became old enough to spend money, that moment said child should learn to handle it wisely. Louise has an older sister and brother, and all three children were given ample allowances, but from the age of five onward, if they spent all their money the first day, no further funds were forthcoming until the next allowance date.

Even at the age of five it aggravated Louise. "Dad never weakened," she says. "No matter how we teased or cried, no matter why we wanted more money, he was adamant. The only arguments I ever heard between my mother and father when we were little were about his views on our spending. Mother thought children should be carefree. She didn't approve of our having too much responsibility. She Louise Allbritton is a new type and the fastest rising star on the Universal lot. Playing the second lead in "Pittsburgh" opposite no less a person than Dietrich, she scored so decisively that her second picture, "Fired Wife," brought her stardom.

At the left you see that Louise's most frequent date is handsome Alan Curtis.

Louise lives at the Studio Club, which is supported by Hollywood contributions for the benefit of young girls starting out in the movie business—and not just actresses. However, life there is not all just sitting in front of a radio, writing letters.

Girls can live in the Studio Club for as little as thirteen dollars a week—that's room and two meals. But sometimes a girl likes a snack or a third meal. Then she goes to the community kitchen to prepare her own—and to wash up her dishes like a good housewife, when the meal is finished.

said there was plenty of money. Why not give it to us?

"We children thought, quite naturally, that our allowances were too small and that Father was cruel. But ah, what I learned about money from him!

"I remember once when I was about six I had planned to buy candy and go to a movie on Saturday. At the same time I coveted a certain toy wagon. 'Why not buy the wagon, Louise?' suggested Father. 'That will last a long time and you can enjoy it for weeks. You will have eaten the candy and forgotten the movie by tomorrow.' In spite of the fact I knew that he was right, I resented it. I gorged on candy that day . . . and cried for the wagon I didn't get."

By the time Louise was ready for college, she still resented this financial supervision. Her father sent her from her home town of Wichita Falls, Texas, to attend the University of Oklahoma. She felt grown-up, not only because she was away from home, but because her proud parents had given her a checking account.

"I loved clothes," confesses Louise. "Whatever I saw that appealed to me, I bought. I felt important dashing off checks. But when I went home for Christmas, flat broke, Father was very stern. 'Since you haven't learned to handle money,' he told me, 'I'm closing your account. Henceforth I'll send you one check each month, and you'll have to make that do.'

"I thought he was kidding me and laughed. When I returned to school, I wrote three big checks for things I happened to see and like. The checks bounced! I was horribly embarrassed. I had to go before the treasurer of the University to explain and take up the bad checks with one my father sent me. I felt like a worm. I had to pinch and scrape all the rest of that year to get by.

JACK BENNY'S ADVENTURES WITH OUR BOYS IN ITALY

by MICHAEL SHERIDAN

The inside story of Jack Benny's trip overseas to entertain our fighting forces

BETWEEN hearty mouthfuls of a chopped chicken-liver sandwich, eaten with great gusto, Jack Benny, just in from a 32,000 mile trip overseas to entertain the troops, in the course of which he had played to about 150 audiences composed of 300 to 30,000 men, said enthusiastically: "I just can't wait to do it all over again."

Whereupon the wise ones nodded and smiled. Why not . . . who wouldn't give his right hand for a jaunt like the one America's favorite comedian had just made, being treated wherever you went like royalty itself!

But what the wise ones didn't know about was Jack's undisclosed brush with death at a small hospital in Palermo, of that eleventh hour hazardous hop into Italy without protective air escort, or that precarious landing in a sandstorm in the Persian Gulf, where anything might have happened! What they didn't know was the true story behind, not only this trip of Jack Benny's, but every trip like it, and why the Jack Bennys and the Bob Hopes of the world earn a tender and deserved membership in Hollywood's army of soldiers in greasepaint.

So here, in Jack's own words, is the story. "All along the trip things had happened (Continued on page 76)

This is no Waukegan pool room! But Jack seems at home, all the same, cueing balls with the fellas at one of the stops made on his twelve-week tour.

Cleaning up his kit, after mess. "K.P. Benny" they called him, with lots of cracks made about his faithful violin, and a guy named Fred Allen.

MOVIELAND'S Beauty Parlors

DO YOU really know how to comb your hair?

Do you really know how to brush it?

Do you know that daily correct combing and proper brushing can save you hours and dollars at your hairdressers, that your hair and all your appearance will be immensely benefited? And do you, also, know how to care for these combs and brushes themselves? In these wartime days, those two beauty necessities spell Conservation in a big way, so we've decided it is high time to give out with words on these subjects.

Cheryl Walker of "Stage Door Canteen," and now a star on the Warner Brothers lot in Burbank, offered to help us prove our points to you.

If you have the same sort of fine hair as Cheryl, you're just as apt as she is to find it in countless little aggravating morning tangles that try your temper and the comb. Right then, early in the morning, right in those tangles, is where you start learning what's what with your hair. To remove snarls and tangles, use the coarse teeth of the comb. The best place to begin is on the lowest layer of hair at the back of the head, with one small section of hair at a time. In the illustrations, we follow Cheryl in the procedure of dressing her hair.

In your first combing, after (Continued on next page)

1. With the coarse teeth of the comb, Cheryl Walker, Warner Bros. star, illustrates how tangles should be removed from sections of the hair.

2. The fine end of the comb is used for last-minute touches to your hair-do or to set the hair in curls. Cheryl combs her hair over a finger.

3. In brushing, place the back of the brush next the scalp and treat the hair in sections, somewhat larger than those for combing out snarls.

4. Remember this too, Miss Walker says, when you are brushing, that the strand of hair should lie firmly over the brush bristles, and the brush should be slowly lifted straight up, continuing to the very ends of the hair—no half way business.

5. The final product. And if Cheryl Walker can do it, so can you. It takes time, yes—fifteen minutes at a throw—but it gives results. And if you're really serious about this business, you ought to read our tips on brush and comb care as well.

removing tangles from the under layer of hair, you are ready to proceed to the next layer, and on up to the crown of your head. The same process is repeated on both sides of the head and then on top, until all of your hair is free from snarls.

So it's too much trouble! We can hear that muttering and mumbling from here! Well, at the most it takes an extra five minutes in the morning. While we know it's your head and your hair, we suggest, politely but firmly, that it's better to allow a little extra time than to lose the teeth from your comb and a fist full of hair in a few minutes of bad-temper yanking. And we just do wish you could see how the movie girls comb their hair, comb, comb, comb, ten fifteen careful minutes at a time, time after time, all day long, so that every hair is trained every moment to lie right where it should.

Now, let's talk about the fine-tooth end of the comb. It was designed to be used in setting the hair in curls, or in dressing and placing the final touches to the hairstyle. Do as Cheryl does, and comb your curls in soft sections around the end of a finger.

Brushing, in the case of both dry and wet hair, should come after combing (but not, of course, after setting). The brush was not made to remove snarls; it was created to polish, clean, smooth and add luster to the hair.

If you're not going to use your brush properly, you might just as well throw it out the window and have done with it, because that's its only value.

The one sure way to ruin brush bristles and work hardship on your scalp is to hold the brush flat against the head.

In brushing, the trick is again to take sections of the hair, larger than for the combing process. Cheryl places the brush with its back to the scalp so that the section lies firmly over the brush bristles, then lifts it slowly straight up, so that the bristles embrace every hair in the strand to the very ends. She repeats this two or three times, then places the brush in the same position on the opposite side of the strand and follows the same procedure. This same routine continues on around and all over the head in the initial morning hair toilette.

If your hair is dry, you can now be assured it is free from all dust and is clean and lustrous, ready for fine-tooth combing to form your curls. If your hair is brushed wet, following a shampoo and combing, it is now ready for the setting of the pincurls.

Above all, for conservation of combs and brushes, keep them clean. You should have two combs and two brushes, so that one set is clean at all times, changing over day by day.

This pays dividends. Soiled combs and brushes on a clean head are taboo. Clean combs and brushes on a head slightly in need of a shampoo keep it alive until you can dunk it.

Cleansing of brushes and combs should be with lukewarm water and a good, pure soap. No matter how good your brushes and combs, hot water will be certainly injurious.

In washing your brush, use a narrow, stiff-bristled brush, very similar to that you use for grooming your eyebrows. Run this in between the hairbrush bristles, both across and lengthwise, to remove any accumulations on the bristle-holder. To cleanse the bristles themselves, have plenty of soapsuds on your fingers and run them lightly and carefully through the bristles. Rough and hurried treatment will break down bristles.

Rinsing should be done by dipping the brush in warm water (don't forget what we said about hot water), shaking it out with a quick flip of the wrist, and repeating several times until you are sure the brush is completely free of soapy water. Now, using a rough towel, rub the bristles very lightly; then turn the brush over, and pat the bristles (again lightly) against the towel.

Your brush should then be stood, handle down in a glass, preferably near an open window to dry quickly and sweetly in fresh air.

In cleansing combs, use a small stiff brush, warm water, and a good, pure soap. Don't be afraid to exert a little pressure to get that brush briskly running in between the teeth, because combs retain oil and dust more than do hairbrushes.

Combs, too, should be rinsed in warm water. Turn both sides alternately against your rough towel and slap moisture out onto the towel. Your combs deserve the same glass treatment for drying as your hairbrushes. Placing them to dry on their sides allows uncaught moisture to accumulate between the teeth for a slow-drying process that is harmful.

So treat your combs and brushes gently and well, and they'll serve your scalp and hair faithfully for beauty for the duration!

EYEING RELAXATION:

How are your tired eyes?

Studio lights bring on eye fatigue quickly, and Bette Davis, starring in "Watch on the Rhine," admits to the common ailment.

Bette combines an eye exercise with witch hazel or ice water applications.

She lies down with absorbent cotton pads soaked in either one of the two over her eyes, keeps them there for a three-minute period. Then she removes them, and exercises her eyes by opening them as widely and closing them as tightly as possible ten or twenty times.

Newly soaked pads are again placed over her closed eyelids; she relaxes again and then repeats the exercise.

Sum total: Ten minutes of complete bodily relaxation, plus eyes minus strain and fatigue.

FARM NOTES ON BEAUTY:

Out Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer way, Ginny Simms comes forth with a few practical suggestions if you're living down on the farm.

Ginny has a farm of her own a few miles from Hollywood, and says she finds her best beauty aids there.

Listen to this:

She uses lemon for bleaching out tan, removing vegetable stains from hands, rinsing her hair, and as an early-morning drink with hot water for general toning of the system.

She rubs her face with the inside of a cucumber, washes it off with buttermilk. That's for all the benefits of

THEIR FAVORITE TUNE

It's because of Hedy Lamarr that John Loder prefers "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody." He first met Hedy years ago; but they remained casual acquaintances, since each then was in love with someone else. Then one day John saw Hedy in "Ziegfeld Girl" and heard her song, "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody."

About six months ago he was working one evening as a bus boy at the Hollywood Canteen. Suddenly the orchestra started "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody." He looked up and saw Hedy herself, working behind the snack bar. She smiled at him. Somehow the picture of Hedy and the sound of the melody blended together in his mind; and he went over to her and began to chat. It was the first time they'd really had very much to say to each other. Now when dancing together John always makes one request of the orchestra—their song.

(Watch for Hedy Lamarr in MGM's "The Heavenly Body" and don't miss John Loder in his Warners' "Old Acquaintance")

COASTGUARDSMAN MATURE ON LEAVE

Three weeks' freedom in Hollywood finds Vic Mature with K. T. Stevens, on his first night out. They greet her dad, the famous Director Sam Wood, at the Mocambo.

—Acme Photo

At the Mocambo again, with Anne Shirley, the third girl he dated. And it's said they were celebrating announcement of their intent to wed. There were even elopement rumors.

Oh, oh, the inevitable coincidence! There's Martha Kemp Mature, busy greeting uniforms just a few tables away. (Martha, the second wife who divorced Vic. Remember?) But he has still to run into Rita Hayworth.

—Press Association

What of the Eddie Albert romance Hollywood had claimed for Anne, just before Mature came home? Anyway, Vic's gone back to duty, and nothing definitely settled. Or is it?

Second night, the date was with Betty Hutton. And third night, too. However Betty (see the story on page 49) says her heart belongs to Charles Martin. If that's the case, then Mature's "just a friend."

Movieland's Five Best Pictures of the Month

GUADALCANAL DIARY

(20th Century-Fox)

"GUADALCANAL DIARY" is notable for being America's first factual picture about America's first victorious offensive in the current war. Its production had to fulfill a definite obligation to history. The United States Marine Corps, which wrote this magnificent page of heroism in sweat and blood, demanded absolute accuracy in the film that was made from the Richard Tregaskis' long-time best seller. That Hollywood fully met these demands is attested by the fact that this picture has been added to the official Marine archives in Washington.

It is an arousing and thrilling entertainment which sweeps you into hand-to-hand conflict with the treacherous Japanese enemy. Its suspense is terrific for being stated in the tragic calm of pauses between the fighting. You quickly forget that these are actors portraying roles in this strong all-male cast.

It begins simply and powerfully on a transport crowded with laughing Marines who have only the vaguest notion of their objective, follows them through the hell of shot and shell, and stops when the seasoned veterans of three months of battles are relieved by Army replacements. It does not attempt to reach a conventional ending, for such an ending has yet to be written.

There is an over-all excellence to the enactments of Lloyd Nolan's "Sgt. Malone," William Bendix's ex-Brooklyn taxi driver, Preston Foster's "Father Donnelly," Anthony Quinn's "Soose," Richard Conte's Capt. Davis, Eddie Acuff's Tex and many, many others. Yet the character most difficult to forget is the 'teen-age "Chicken" as played by Richard Jaeckel in his first screen role.

GOVERNMENT GIRL

(RKO-Radio)

WAR-CROWDED Washington is again the background for an engaging comedy romance. In "Government Girl" Olivia de Havilland plays a clever girl secretary who knows her way through the red-taped maze of confusion in the Capitol. That is why she is assigned to help the newly appointed chief of the bomber division. A young executive from Detroit quite aware that his job of meeting quotas is impossible, but equally determined to exceed expectations, however staggering. This means cutting a lot of red tape and offending a large number of bigwigs. It is the only way that he can prove that he is not being overpaid at his salary of one dollar a year.

As Ed Browne, this social-blundering, two-fisted go-getter, Sonny Tufts demonstrates that the hit he registered as the Marine in "So Proudly We Hail" was no accident. Tufts is one of the surest bets of the year for stardom in rugged individualist roles. He has the know-how in his portrayals of Americans whose know-how is winning the war.

The de Havilland performance is gayly light-hearted for farcial emphasis. She reaches a spirited dramatic climax when she bursts in on a Senate investigating committee engaged in examining the shortcuts Browne took to fill the skies with Yankee Bombers. Her speech to the august group of Solons hasn't been equalled on the screen since "Mr. Smith Went To Washington."

The girl has two suitors with whom she is romantically involved, roles sharply played by Paul Stewart and Jess Barker. Secondary parts fall to Anne Shirley and James Dunn as a honeymooning couple coping with the housing problem.

OLD ACQUAINTANCE

(Warner Bros.)

BETTE DAVIS and Miriam Hopkins were enthusiastically received as antagonists in "The Old Maid," and another drama which would pit them against each other has since been sought. "Old Acquaintance," from a play by John Van Druten, was finally chosen. So again we have Miss Davis in this corner, and Miss Hopkins in that.

They have been childhood friends, and naturally Bette is Miriam's houseguest when she returns to her home town in 1924 after the success of her first novel. Miriam has married, has a pleasant home and is going to have a baby. Yet her jealousy over Bette's fame causes her selfish dissatisfaction. She wants to be a novelist, too, in fact has written a potboiler which she asks Bette to submit to publishers.

Eight years pass. Miriam's trashy novels have earned a fortune. She has flaunted her popularity, which is much greater than that of Bette, a careful, conscientious writer with far more lasting merit. Furthermore Miriam's domineering nature has at last outraged her husband who leaves her. When we meet him ten years later, he has become a major in the Army following Pearl Harbor. Bette and Miriam have continued to be friends, and Bette is in love with a man considerably her junior. How this strange friendship almost wrecks Bette's chances of happiness brings the emotional drama to its climax.

"Old Acquaintance" will be relished more by women than by men. Without the presence of its two brilliant stars, the picture would not be among our best selections of the month. Their acting lifts it to a definite preeminence. Handsome Gig Young and John Loder are the men concerned, and the child grows up to be the attractive Dolores Moran.

CORVETTE K-225

(Universal)

IF YOU enjoyed "Air Force" which starred an Army bomber, you will find "Corvette K-225" a thrilling entertainment. Corvettes are tough little warships of the Royal Canadian Navy that have proved the Allies' most effective weapon in clearing the North Atlantic of the U-boat menace to vital shipping. As in "Air Force," the film account of a fighting craft is told through the relationship of the crew that mans it. "Corvette K-225" is decidedly see-worthy.

Like all of the better war pictures which have arrived so belatedly from Hollywood, the feature was made with the close cooperation of a branch of the armed services, in this instance the Royal Canadian Navy. Its director, Richard Rosson, spent three months with a camera crew making repeated convoy crossings. Five different times he was aboard corvettes that were attacked by Nazi submarines and airplanes. Consequently, the picture rings with startling authenticity. The action at sea is more often real than reenacted, and the details of running a convoy very interesting. Any information the enemy may gain from this film will merely lead to his wanting to call off the war right now.

Randolph Scott heads the acting cast, impressively supported by James Brown who is fast building in importance, Barry Fitzgerald, Andy Devine and numerous others. Ella Raines makes her initial screen appearance in the only feminine role and exhibits arresting promise. She is an intelligent personality who will bear watching. You may remember that she is the newcomer whose contract is jointly held by Howard Hawks, producer of "Corvette K-225," and Charles Boyer, her discoverer.

THE IRON MAJOR

(RKO-Radio)

HERE is a generous slice of fine Americana, the story of Frank Cavanaugh, an inspired football coach who specialized in making winners of underdog teams. Cavanaugh taught his squads to fight for what they believed in—to glory in the spirit of their schools or get off the squads. It is a creed he personally practiced at Dartmouth, his own alma mater, and sparked others to follow when he became a professional coach at Cincinnati, Denver and Holy Cross.

So soundly did he instil the fighting spirit in his players that most of them promptly marched off at the start of World War I. Naturally Cavanaugh joined them on the field of battle where his indomitable faith in the things he believed right led to feats of valor which won him the rightful nickname of "The Iron Major."

Cavanaugh returned from the first World War a man broken in health. Yet his spirit was unbroken. He coached victorious teams at Boston College, his own Dartmouth and Fordham. The triumph of his belief in love of God, of country and of family is best vindicated by his six sons and his daughter who are at present in the armed services in World War II.

Pat O'Brien scores a resounding hit in the role of Cavanaugh, an even more appealing portrait than the one he drew of Knute Rockne. Less attention is given to this coach's gridiron triumphs than to his heartwarming successes as a husband and a father. Much is owed to the beautiful performance Ruth Warrick gives as Mrs. Cavanaugh and to the unforgettable family scenes they share with the children. There are good jobs also by Robert Ryan and Leon Ames as friends of "The Iron Major."

Farley Granger, seventeen, who broke into filmdom as a want-ad pot of gold. From grocery boy in a California super-market to the role of Damian, peasant lad in "The North Star," and this high school senior is on his way to fame and fortune as a screen star. With a $100,000 contract.

THE DISCOVERY of the MONTH

THE power of the press isn't limited to the front page. The HELP WANTED—MALE column was the beginning of this story of Farley Granger. For, you see, he answered an ad for an actor.

Farley Granger, Farley Granger, Farley Granger. Get it set in your mind, for with his first appearance in Samuel Goldwyn's production "The North Star," he's a sensation and already signed for "The Purple Heart" at Twentieth Century-Fox.

Farley is seventeen years old, 6 feet ¼ inch tall, and weighs 159 pounds. His eyes and hair are both dark brown. He has pearly, even teeth that add to his broad infectious smile. Not bad!

After Farley Granger answered the ad—"Boy, over 17, but not 18; theatrical experience desirable but not essential. Send photo brief biography"—he was given a screen test. From it, Goldwyn found his romantic juvenile for "The North Star," and a seven-year contract was signed beginning at $100 a week. Farley had played only a small role in "The Wookie" in the Hollywood little theater, the Mary Stewart Playhouse, before that.

He's a typical American boy in his tastes and experiences. Still attending North Hollywood High School, his interests lie in the meetings of his high school gang. Farley doesn't smoke, possibly because his parents never told him he mustn't. He swims, rides, hunts and fishes and ice skates at every opportunity. Jane Withers is thé only Hollywood girl he has dated so far.

Like all American boys of his age, he has the thought of going to war clearly in the back of his mind. He'll be glad when it's his turn to get into the actual scrap, for though he's making great strides in his motion picture career, he wants to get this war business tended to so that he, and all of us, can get back to living our own lives in our own way, tending to our own business which is our own privilege.

when he started in show business."

Evans is one of the people who "discovered" Sinatra. We quote the word because of a private opinion that Frankie discovered himself when at the age of nineteen or thereabouts, he suddenly decided to become a singer. Among those who helped him bring his talents before the public, however, were Evans, Major (Amateur Hour) Bowes, and bandleaders Bob Chester, Harry James, and Tommy Dorsey.

The decision to become a singer was made, as you may have read, by the Hoboken, New Jersey, lad one night—just like that—when he had taken his best girl Nancy to a neighborhood movie house to see Bing Crosby. He was a cub reporter for the Jersey Observer when he paid his ticket money and entered the theater. When he made his exit some two hours later, he was a fellow who had forsaken the business of gathering news, and decided to make it instead.

Question almost any other person who has achieved vocal fame and you will find the owner speaking of his voice as a gift—of heritage, or maybe just of providence. Always they knew they must sing, always there was a divine stirring of music or rhythm within them.

The boy from Hoboken always liked to sing—there were sessions with the school glee club and band—but he liked to laugh, too, and also did that frequently. Singing wasn't any more than a form of expression until that fateful night when, sitting in a movie theater, a crooner was born.

"I knew if Crosby could do it, I could—" is the way he puts it.

Talking to him between scenes on the "Higher and Higher" sound stage, we failed to find anything of arrogance in this simple statement. Confidence is the word for Frankie, we think, and if there is any divine gift pulsing within his five foot ten, one hundred and forty-five pound frame it is a driving determination which, if harnessed, could no doubt solve the majority of the world's fuel problems.

The Sinatra gaze is straight and candid, coming out of eyes that are lighter than you'd expect with his dark complexion, and softer than you'd expect to find in his rather gaunt face. He gives you the unabashed glance and says he knew he could become a famous crooner and you wouldn't dispute him, even if he hadn't already proved his point.

He couldn't have looked much younger at nineteen than he does now at twenty-five, and it's not hard to imagine him as he was that night, a kid sitting in an audience looking up at Crosby on the screen in the way any American can look at a sing-King, looking at him not with humbleness but with admiration for what he was, and determining to be as much. He quit his newspaper job the next day.

From then on, Frankie had a voice—the same outpouring from the same vocal chords he'd always had—only now it was different. Now it was an instrument to be worked with and used, to be strengthened until it was good enough to take him where he wanted to go. He never seemed to have any doubt of his future, once he had decided on it.

How complete was his absorption in his chosen career is testified to by Sinatra himself, who tells you quite frankly that he doesn't remember much about his life until he started singing.

"So much has happened to me in the last few years, and so fast, my life before that is just a blank."

His home life? "I was the only child. Folks thought a lot of me, I guess." His school days? "I was a pretty restless kid in school—I don't know whether I got much out of it or not—"

The record says that Frankie's small, wiry, and power-driven figure was a distinguished one in school athletics. He played on a champion basketball team, won a swimming trophy, and was outstanding in track events. After school hours he worked on a news truck to earn his spending money.

His dad, a city fireman, had dreamed of his becoming a civil engineer, but circumstances interfered with a college course. On graduation from high school, he took a year of journalism and shorthand in a business college, and finally went to work on the Jersey paper from which he later resigned to become a singer.

"Do you sometimes look back and wonder what your life might have been if you had become an engineer, as your dad wanted, or stayed on a paper?" we asked him. "Do you get scared when you think you might have missed all the wonderful things that have come to you through your singing?"

"No," says the Croon Prince calmly. "Because I think it would have been about the same if I had decided on any other line. I was determined to have the best. I think a person can go any place he sets his mind to. It's all in liking what you're doing. I probably wouldn't have stayed working at anything else long, because I wouldn't have liked it the way I like singing. Once I found what I really wanted to do—well, the rest was easy."

The first time Frankie ever raised his voice seriously was on a Major Bowes Amateur Hour. He won first prize with a song which since then has been his favorite tune, "Night and Day." The prize was a nine months' engagement with a Bowes unit, and he started out at once with a troupe headed toward the West coast. After three months of touring, he knew being an Amateur, even a paid one, wasn't what he wanted. He quit and returned to Hoboken.

Back in Jersey he started auditioning for radio and was soon heard

LETTER from a BOY in the SERVICE

★ ★ $10.00 LETTER ★ ★

Little praise has been given to the motion picture industry for the fine work it's doing today. Here's a gallant salute to the actors and actresses who are touring the Army, Navy, and Marine camps. We owe them much, and they have our everlasting thanks and blessings.

Motion pictures are the greatest form of entertainment and the most popular to the boys in the service. Without actors how can the studios keep on producing A-1 hits? Surely some one can see that the best weapon to combat homesickness, troubles, and worries is entertainment—the greatest morale builder of this century. Many of us have laughed our tears away at a motion picture, forgetting the great span of miles between us and our loved ones. It is to these stars that we are ever grateful and we will never forget. Now, most of them are our "buddies" and "shipmates" fighting side by side with them. Let them fight, yes, but let them fight our just as dangerous enemies, homesickness, worries, and the thought of being "through."

Here's one sailor who's all out for the draft deferment for Hollywood actors, and equally out to give you of the motion picture industry a rousing Navy cheer. I salute you!

on some eighteen sustaining shows. The sum total of his salary at this time was seventy cents carfare paid by a big-hearted station manager, but our embryo star didn't count his time or effort wasted.

Every time his voice went on the air he was selling himself on the biggest market in the world, radio. The first buyer of his talent was the Rustic Inn, in New Jersey, offering him a steady and paying job. On the strength of this small success he married his home-town sweetheart, dark-haired Nancy Barbato, and splurged on a three-day honeymoon.

Frankie liked singing with Bob Chester's band at the Rustic Inn, but the place wasn't big enough to hold his ambition. He gave his notice, and when a fellow named Harry James walked in and offered him a featured spot with his newly organized band, he walked right out with him. Six months later he left James to accept a better offer from Tommy Dorsey.

Right about here, any discussion of the Sinatra success becomes a sort of chicken-or-the-egg controversy. There are some supporters for the theory that the singer rode to fame on the crest of the band-leader's popularity, others insist the band-leader attained his popularity because of his singer. Take whichever side you want, but during the Sinatra-Dorsey era their recordings of "I'll Never Smile Again," "Night and Day," "Stardust," "This Love of Mine," (which Frankie wrote) and other ballads, hit the top in record sales throughout the country.

Dorsey signed for two pictures, "Las Vegas Nights" and "Ship Ahoy," and Sinatra appeared with him. A spectator stooping to tie his shoe lace during the unreeling of either picture could have missed the singer's appearance entirely. Nevertheless, it was right about this time that a deluge of offers began to pour in from promoters, theater managers, and radio advertisers.

It was Columbia Broadcasting Company who convinced the beatific baritone that he was now ready to step away from Dorsey and become a solo star. They built a series of daily broadcasts around him, and two months later landed him radio's plum singing role, as the star of Lucky Strike's "Hit Parade." The Parade, going perpetually on and on through the years, has worn out a number of artists, but no one of them has ever hit the dizzy pace in broadcasting popularity set by the boy who started his own march in Jersey.

You undoubtedly know by now, the Sinatra epidemic was first recognized as virulent with his solo engagement at New York's Paramount theater. Strong men on the New York police force had come to pale at the word "jitterbug" even before Frankie.

With the advent of the Sinatra fan, however, they were up against a psychopathic phrase of youthful frenzy which required care rather than force in its handling. Many of the "case histories" of these kids have already hit print, but one of the most interesting is that of the seventeen-year-old girl who sat in the front row at every performance and let out a loud banshee wail every time Frankie opened his mouth.

Various attempts were made by the management to keep the child out of the theater, but she had more ways of getting into a building than a termite. There was no use of her staying home, she insisted, because she just kept playing her idol's records and screaming and crying, and her parents didn't like it either.

It is a well-known fact that you have to dig pretty deep to find a press-agent's nerves, but after a while even Sinatra-ballyhooer Evans decided the young lady had to be stopped before all concerned came down with the screaming-meemies. He tried reasoning with her, gently breaking the news that Frankie was a husband and a father. Her ailment, she insisted, was not romantic but rhythmic, and if she could just talk to Frankie once it might be cured.

Evans first extracted a promise of future good behavior, then took her around to the dressing room. She sat backstage, confiding her activities to biting her nails, until Sinatra finished his show. As he approached, she started going glassy-eyed. With one leap she fastened herself around his neck, clinging with the strength of a drowning person, until three men finally loosened her hold. You can still raise a sweat on the crooner's brow just by reminding him of the experience.

To get her out of the dressing room they had to give her "something of Frankie's." His bow-tie, she thought would do the trick. But that was not the last they saw of the young lady. The next performance, and every performance until the end of his engagement, she was in the front row, wearing the bow-tie. No more screams, however, from then on she sat with a large napkin stuffed in her mouth, dutifully biting down on it, through all his numbers!

It was this kid, multiplied by a million, who has created the Sinatra of today. You couldn't talk to him five minutes without noting that although he has abandoned his zoot suits for dinner coats and Hollywood tailored sport jackets, he will always wear them with the faint swagger of a fellow daring someone to try and knock 'em off. He has a toughness and a fiber the kids recognize, because it's the same as their own. But it's an admirable sort of cockiness he has, tempered with a very sincere awareness.

"I'm the luckiest guy in the world," is his most frequent statement.

"How do you like being the star of your own picture?" we asked him.

My First SCREEN TEST

By MAUREEN O'HARA

who plays opposite Charles Laughton for the third time in RKO's "This Land Is Mine." (Maureen was guilty of the serious mistake of so many seventeen-year-olds. She says of herself, "I was the sorriest sophisticate." But read the whole story as she tells it here.)

"When I was offered a movie chance because I'd progressed to leads with the Abbey Players in Dublin, I wasn't insistent enough upon remaining my right age. I was tested in London, and I let them dress me up in a sophisticated gold lame gown and assume I was as exotic as Hedy Lamarr. I had been a fat little girl and this crack at overpowering sex appeal temporarily befuddled me. All I had to do was to stand, sit, turn around, walk about a room, pick up a phone, and sit down once more. Hedy Lamarr could do just that and be ravishing, but pretense stood out on me as though I were a burlesque siren. I learned then and there that the girl who sticks to her own age is smartest.

"Charles Laughton, who got me the test, agreed I'd best go back where I came from. But before I could leave London, he recalled me and asked me to read a part. I didn't rely on my appearance that time. I was cautious. 'Surely you don't expect me to read this intelligently until I've read it to myself and know what it's about.' That was a seventeen-year-old using her head. Finally they agreed it would be unfair, otherwise. So I got into pictures in spite of my test, studying the part carefully to counteract the sad siren impression."

a little trouble, but I seemed to fall right in to it—"

Even with its assurance, this was an understatement. The Warbling Wonder Boy's screen personality came over so well that on viewing the rushes, RKO execs immediately tore up his two-picture contract and signed him for seven years.

You take it, talking to this boy, that his achievements have been mental even more than material. The ten-room home in Hasbrouck Heights, N. J., that he and wife Nancy decorated "just the way we like it," the mink coat Nancy now wears, the bank book with all its pleasingly plump figures, all are very fine things indeed. But in all that grand new mansion the thing which appeals to its owner most is a clock hanging over his desk in his den. It's handmade, it is expensive, but its prime worth is in a quotation inscribed under the dial:

"Music is the only form of art which touches the absolute."

Us, we're not even sure if we know what Mr. Schopenhauer had in mind when he penned the phrase in one of his philosophical works. We've got a good idea what Frankie has in mind, however, when he goes out of the room and comes back again, as he says, to read it over. Music, to this twenty-five year old lad who lives by it, has become a thing of accomplishment, of pride, a common ground whereon he can stand with people of prestige and feel that he is one of them.

There are two fairly new words in his vocabulary. One is "creative," the other is "movie-wise." The first is the highest praise he can bestow on a work, the second the highest praise he can bestow on a person. He'd like to earn both adjectives for himself. Someday he wants not only to be the star of his own radio program, but to build it complete from continuity to production.

Meeting Norma Shearer is a Hollywood experience which stands out in his mind above anything else.

"What a wonderful person—and so movie-wise. Just talking to her for five minutes makes you want to get off on the right foot in this business, and stay on it!"

Someday, the story will be written of the most wondered-about wife of 1943, the "Nancy" whose name runs like a recurrent refrain through all of Frank Sinatra's talk of the past, present or future. It will no doubt be a great love story, replete with courage and faith and tolerance. Certain it is that any young man who can have one foot on a comet and keep the other securely rooted in a happy home, is largely indebted to the wisdom and understanding of his young mate.

Although Frankie's tool in trade is romantic wordage, he uses a sincerer lingo to describe her:

"Nancy is a very level-headed girl. She doesn't let anything bother her. We used to talk things over when we were first married, and both of us knew that when things happened like we wanted them to, a lot of things we didn't want would come, too."

They were friends before they were sweethearts. Nancy lived across the street from his home; they used to go to beach parties with the same teen-age crowd.

"I liked her because she was quiet, I guess. Some of the other kids were pretty wild, me included, but Nancy was a nice conscientious girl. She steadied me. I had ambition, and she seemed to understand that, too."

That steadying influence of Nancy's undoubtedly makes her pretty nice to come home to after the hectic excitement of the cheering crowds. She keeps their home on a normal, sane plane, to judge from her young husband's conversation. They would like their children to have a musical education, a harp has been decided on for Nancy Junior. Someday they'll have a home in California, and Mrs. Sinatra no doubt agrees with his rather wistful wish that before long, he will have a little more time to "fool around the house and lie out in the sun."

At the time we talked with him, the Croon Prince had no idea what his next picture would be like or when filming on it would start. He had specified to his movie bosses that he would like to be with his wife when their second child was born. By the time this reaches print, both events will have happened.

He says: "Of course I don't expect things to go on at the pace they have been going. I wouldn't want the excitement to keep up—I couldn't stand it, either physically or mentally. I've been lucky but I've also worked pretty hard. A lot of people say I'm not here to stay. I think I am. Luck is fickle, but hard work is pretty dependable.

"I still say, 'Look at Crosby' and I'm generally misunderstood when I say it. The guy is still my greatest hero—and the thing I admire about him most is he's never let down in the quality of what he does. A fellow who gets up there and can't stay, doesn't deserve to."

Frank Sinatra has what it takes to win success—and keep it. He likes the weather up there at the top of the heap, and it'll take a lot to knock him down. He is a stylist, and when and if crooning becomes monotonous—as it well might any minute now if the juke boxes and radio don't give his records a rest—he will find some other medium to express himself.

"Someday I may try to find that bridge between classic and popular music," he says. "Busy people can't sit still long enough to enjoy good music the way it should be enjoyed. Brainy people like something better than a popular song. I'm going to look for a way to reconcile the two."

THE END

A HUNCH HE CAN'T EXPLAIN

It's a "Happy Land" that Don Ameche is playing in for Twentieth Century-Fox.

After meager weeks of eating a dime's worth of beans at noon and a five-cent apple at night, Don Ameche won a role in "Jerry for Short." His first chance at Broadway! The play didn't last long, but Ameche did well in it. And now, at last he had a toe hold on the stage. Right then, fate intervened in the form of a nickel. Texas Guinan offered him a small part in a touring vaudeville show. Common sense told Ameche to remain in New York and clinch his first Broadway appearance with another. He tossed a nickel. Heads, he'd go with Guinan, and it came down heads. When the tour ended in Chicago, Don—on the verge of hopping a train to New York—found he could have an unimportant part with a Chicago stage company. Common sense told him to choose New York. He flipped the nickel and took the Chicago job.

Time and again Ameche had wondered why he went with the Guinan show, anyway. Now he wondered what on earth he was doing in Chicago. But the Chicago play lasted a fortnight, and Ameche bought a ticket back to New York. Then he heard that a Chicago radio station would give an audition next day to singers. Ameche's friends said he'd be insane to wait over for the audition; "there'll be a million other guys standing in line." Don tossed that nickel, and took the audition which led to radio fame and then to Hollywood.

Wally would swing a hammock beside her in the elephant car, and she'd hold his hand gently in her trunk all night. "But," Wally recalls, "you had to wake sharply at dawn. Otherwise, Topsy, having no more need for you—she thought—would try to kneel on you. That's the way an elephant kills."

When Topsy knelt on one of Wally's successors, Beery took a long trip back, to save the elephant from being executed. "I wrote and warned the guy!" he explained indignantly. "Topsy's kneeling is just her nature. You have to take animals like you find them."

Wally learned to take human beings that way, too. He graduated to Ringling Brothers' circus—the tops—and hit New York. The big town, the White Way, the stir and bustle of sophisticated life, fascinated the greenie from the elephant tent. He flexed his throat muscles, applied for a chorus job—and got it! Only weeks later, Charles Frohman, world-famous theatrical producer, needed an ascetic-looking boy to play a priest in "A Japanese Nightingale." He promoted Wally from the chorus—and then the human animal slipped!

Four chorus friends of Wally, on opening night, each pressed a drink on him, convincing him that it would cure him of the stage fright that had him trembling. He had never tasted liquor before; the four drinks, in his excited state, passed him out.

That's the actor's unforgivable crime, to be unable to go on-stage. Wally was thrown out, literally; picked himself up in the alley, took a streetcar to the Bronx where his old friend Topsy was quartered, and spent a miserable night, sitting by the big elephant. At dawn—deciding he was no quitter—he took another streetcar back to Broadway and, that day, succeeded in reaching Frohman. Moved by the nineteen-year-old's contrite sincerity, Frohman (the two later became great friends) broke theatrical tradition and forgave him.

Two years later, while singing a minor role in "The Yankee Tourist" and understudying star Raymond Hitchcock, Wally received his big break. Hitchcock's health made him leave the show; Wally's name went up in lights.

At once the boy wrote Mom: "I'm doing good. Come and see me."

From Kansas City to New York seemed a long way; Mom required five months to make up her mind and arrived. Wally, meeting her at the train, looked glum. That morning Hitchcock had returned to town, to resume his role; lights were being changed back, in the sockets over the Astor Theater.

Wally, though, was able proudly to introduce the toilworn patrolman's wife to such friends as Richard Harding Davis, then the world's most famous war correspondent; Reginald de Koven, composer of the operetta "Robin Hood," and Victor Herbert, whose marvelous songs the young man had been singing. (Perhaps the greatest happiness in Wally's past life was that both his mother and father survived long enough to share his fortune. They lived their last years surrounded by everything they wanted—all provided by Wally.)

Work and lack of false pride—and vision—were carving a career no one could have guessed. While a chorus boy, Wally had travelled, on days when there were no matinees, and in summer spaces between stage shows, to New Rochelle, where a small new movie company, Tanhauser, was paying $5 a day for acting in "big" roles, and $3 for small parts. That was in connection with the new "toy," motion pictures, and Wally continued to work double, after he became a stage star. Those in the theater who found it out laughed at him, but he could shut his eyes and see people in theaters all over the world, crowding in, one of these days, to look at the new "toy."

No actress worth even five dollars a day would let herself be seen in a motion picture—this was 1906-08—so when another company wanted to make a series of comedies featuring a Swedish housemaid, they had to find a man to wear the skirts.

Would Wally do it? Sure he would! And he did, for $75 a picture. A young reporter named Louella Parsons wrote the scripts, for $25 apiece.

Wally's stage rise continued—singing leads in such famous successes as "The Student Prince" and "Babes In Toyland"—but his mind was on Chicago, where a truly ambitious movie company, Essanay, had its headquarters. He went into an operatic stock season there, to be near Essanay. They told him, at the season's end, "We've nothing big enough for you. Go on back to New York. We'll let you know in the Fall."

But Wally gave them another address. He was half in love with a beautiful young blonde, singing in the stock company, and she had said: "I know where there's a young married couple camping out on a lonely island in the Wisconsin lakes. Let's go up there and join them."

Wally had never really played in his life. Now, proposing to loaf a summer, and fall the rest of the way in love, he set out with the blonde. In the glow of a Wisconsin sunset, a lean Indian, having paddled the pair twelve miles across blue water, landed them at the wooded isle where the amiable chaperones dwelt.

That was a night of stars . . . water lapping the shore . . . the panorama of nature . . . the close-together feeling that a campfire brings.

Wally thought he knew what he was heading for, but he didn't care.

Next morning their first sight was

UNIFORMED HITCH-HIKING in HOLLYWOOD

When Jean Arthur was in Palmdale filming scenes for "A Lady Takes a Chance," she had one scene to do waiting for a bus. Before the bus arrived, two cadets from the Lancaster Air Base nearby, passed by in a car. Not seeing the camera, set up behind a filling station across the road, they stopped to give her a lift. Then they discovered they were breaking up a movie scene.

The film troupe forgave them and invited the cadets to have dinner with them in Palmdale that evening, and before night was over, half the flying field was in the party. Jean, as the only girl, jitterbugged all night to a juke box, and was so tired the next day, she couldn't play the bus-waiting scene. As a matter of fact, it was just as well. The cadets who weren't in on the party had learned how it started and were waiting with their jalopies to offer the lady a ride.

the same lean Indian, paddle flashing, shooting the canoe across the lake again. He brought a telegram from Essanay: "Report at once. Long term contract. Comedy leads."

Three days later Wally, in Chicago, helping select extras for his first Essanay picture, chose one named Gloria Swanson.

That Essanay deal set a chain of events in train: Wally called west to act for the fast-growing Keystone Company; Gloria following; marriage, divorce, fantastic money for Wally.

What became of the Wisconsin idyll-that-was-to-have-been? Forgotten. That wasn't the last time in history that a movie company's telegram would wreck or build someone's romance!

Wally, growing with the industry, playing important roles or leads in more than 300 movies, has run the gamut of parts. He played motorcycle cops when the motor-cycle was as up-to-date as the airplane is today; played comedy villains with trick moustaches — even played serious menaces, as in the famous "Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," where he enacted a German who munched an apple contendedly while the world was being shot to pieces.

To those roles he added great character leads, such as his immortal portrayal of the name role in "Viva Villa" and the equally remembered, lovable derelict in "The Champ."

About fifteen years ago the public began to take charge. Letters of protest poured in—from lawyers, dentists, senators, mothers, boys and girls, farmers, supreme court judges—whenever the Missourian was cast in violation of his own likable, sincere nature. That has finally resulted in Wally playing nothing but sympathetic roles; earlier it caused the only serious studio quarrel during the actor's fourteen years with MGM.

In 1932 Metro decided to throw the lot's entire star strength into "Grand Hotel." John and Lionel Barrymore, Wally, Jean Harlow, Marie Dressler, Joan Crawford, Greta Garbo—the works.

Explosions occurred when Wally was handed his role—the porter. "This character," Wally told an associate producer, "is effeminate. I won't play it."

Argument raged. The part was "Art"; it would lift Wally to new heights—he had to play it anyway. The big man listened to that line for ten days, then hopped into his Bellanca plane and headed for his high mountain ranch in Wyoming. Lawyers telegraphed, "Pursuant to Clause 2468-x in your contract . . ." and went on to threaten, in 1200 wired words: discharged by Metro, blacklisting by the industry and a $1,000,000 suit for breach of contract.

Wally didn't answer. After the all-star cast had waited three weeks, the studio underlings took the matter to Louis B. Mayer, Metro's headman. He listened. The day was Christmas Eve, and Metro's wise boss telegraphed Wyoming: "You and I have been friends for many years. This will be the first unhappy Christmas of my life, thinking that we are apart in spirit. Won't you come home and talk with me?"

Wally gunned the Bellanca, appeared at Mayer's house Christmas morning (witnesses of the meeting say the actor's eyes were damp) and blurted: "L. B., why didn't you put it like that to me in the first place!"

Drama occurred on Grand Hotel's set as well as before shooting began. Wally, shy and never taking himself too seriously as an "artist," awed by the brilliant collection of stars, tried seemingly to creep on-set. The first day, he was sitting in one of several chairs at one side and became conscious that someone had sunk into the next chair. He cut an eye sideways and, seeing the famous Barrymore profile right in his eye, so to speak, choked up.

Then he managed a weak, tentative: "Hello."

Jawn looked down the classic nose as only Barrymore could, offering no reply whatsoever. Wally might have been an insect.

That cut direct made a recluse out of Beery. He spoke to no one, kept to himself. For eight days he and John worked closely together, without a single remark outside their lines. Then, during a rest period on the eighth day, Wally again became conscious of the Profile, inches away. Barrymore slapped Wally heartily on the knee and let the Voice boom and roll: "Not that I'm falling in love with you or anything"—all the set could hear—"but I'd like to make a statement. You're the best actor on this set."

Wally hasn't answered that one yet. When reminded of it, he laughs the incident off. But friends who know him well reveal, "That's his private Academy Award."

General fame means little to this actor. Hollywood is no part of his life—the moment he's through a picture he hops for one of his ranches. Money is a joke; he will have to pay ninety-odd percent of his salary in taxes this year—maybe all. (Not that he gripes about it; his patriotic anger burns to a cinder anyone who complains about taxes.)

Last month Movieland told of Wally's possible marriage to Miss Aurela Nawrocki, of Houston, Texas. The young lady is equipped both with attractiveness and charm, but Wally also may well have in mind that the presence in his home of a young yet mature woman, during the six months of each year that Carol Ann lives there, would be beneficial to the pretty thirteen-year-old. For his heart is wrapped up in this adopted daughter.

She's quite a girl, this youngster who has borne the Beery name since she was nine months old, and daughter and father together make laughs.

Wally treats her like a man playing gruff games with a small boy. He seldom gets the best of her!

When the two were going to Europe on the Ile de France, Wally, keeping his face straight, warned Carol Ann:

"Now if you see me walking the deck with any young ladies, don't come up and crab my act. Don't say, 'Hello, Daddy,' and make them think I'm an old man. Don't speak to me at all. Just go on by as if you didn't know me."

Carol Ann said, "Yes, Daddy."

A couple of mornings later Wally was deck-strolling, with an attractive girl on each arm.

Carol Ann came by, with her nurse. The child passed Wally, her youthful nose in the air, as if she had never laid eyes on him. Then she reached almost the end-turn of the deck, pulled loose from her nurse, yelled back, "Good morning, DADDY!" and skittered around the corner as fast as 5-year-old legs could carry her.

When the Beery's were divorced in 1938, Carol Ann was bewildered and hurt. She did, and does, love both her adoptive parents, who to her have been, since babyhood, Daddy and Mother. For some time, while divorce matters were being adjusted, she stayed on with Wally. (Now she spends six months of the year with each parent.) She wouldn't sleep alone, nor with a nurse, so Wally had twin beds placed in his room. This worked out at first; then one night Wally, coming home late, frowned in a puzzled way: there stood a lighted candle on the little table between the beds. He blew the candle out, retired thoughtfully. Anxious not to upset any routine that comforted Carol Ann, he said nothing next morning. But he worried. When the same thing happened a second time, and a third, Wally spoke in mock gruffness: "Well, what's the idea of this candle gag? Want to burn the house up, and yourself, too?"

Carol Ann returned her most radiant smile: "You see Daddy, when I'm about to go to sleep, I notice the time. Then I light the candle. When you come in you blow it out. Next morning I measure the candle and know what time you came home."

Wally looked at her a moment, speechless. Then he said: "Young lady, from now on you'll have your own room!"

Carol Ann, at thirteen, dresses smartly (no dates yet), looks two years older than she is. Hazel eyes and light chestnut hair go with quiet and pleasing manners—though she has self-assurance. The most part of her small spending allowance buys movie tickets; she wants to be an actress and those who worked with her on the "Rationing" set say she is eager to work and learn.

Wally remarked the other day, "Well, if the kid stays as she is, and grows up to be happy, I won't have wasted my life, huh?"

A fine monument—his kindness to, and affection for, this child.

Wally is already building another permanent record too—a good legend, the atmosphere that hangs in the air when a man's name is mentioned. One bandy-legged cowboy, who has known the actor for years, expressed it this way, "When he says, 'Hiya Pal!' he means that second word. And no knife across your throat!"

That isn't poetry, but it's Wally.

Ensign Gay and Tyrone Power

MOVIE STARS ARE FANS TOO

Ty Power was a great admirer of Ensign George Gay, the man who alone was the survivor of thirty Americans at the Battle of Midway who belonged to Torpedo Squadron 8. These men dared to attack the Jap fleet, and they gave their lives to do it.

None of the fifteen planes returned. When Ensign Gay's plane was hit by bullets, it dropped into the sea and began to sink. Ensign Gay jumped into a deflated rubber boat and floated on it for hours before he was picked up and flown to a hospital in Midway. Tyrone Power read Ensign Gay's story and was thrilled by it. Twentieth Century-Fox bought the film rights to the story, and Ensign Gay was invited to visit the studio. When Ty, who had just joined the Marines, heard that Ensign Gay was visiting his home lot, he felt he had to meet Gay. But before he'd known of the Ensign's impending visit, he had made an appointment for a luncheon interview with a writer. So Ty invited the writer and the young hero to lunch with him at the same time.

What an interview! Ty tried to be courteous and answer the writer's questions, but just as soon as he'd finish answering a question, Ty would turn to Ensign Gay and question him even more than he was being questioned.

THE LIFE AND LOVES OF BETTY HUTTON

into hard little pig-tails that barely touched her shoulders.

She had just come in from a riding lesson for her next picture, based on the life of Texas Guinan. The soft white shirt was open at her throat and the riding breeches had seen some real wear. She looked about fifteen. She's really twenty-two.

We were sitting in the apartment she rents in Hollywood which is comfortable and homelike—but not at all like a movie star's gilded cage. No soft footed maid or butler disturbed the serenity of the homey sounds coming from the kitchen where Mrs. Adams, Betty's youthful and equally blonde mother, was making chili sauce. For that matter, in this setting Betty didn't look like Betty Hutton, either.

Oh, she's "murder," all right. She's TNT. She's a Pep-Packin'-Parcel from Paramount and the reigning Wild Belle of the air waves.

Right now they are making book in Hollywood that when the box office returns are in for 1944, Betty's name will lead the rest. She'll kill the kids at the camp shows, and she'll sell bonds for Uncle Sam as they've never been sold before. This is the personality the public has come to know as Betty (the hot) Hutton. It's her "front." But there is another Hutton—the girl who sat quietly facing me, wondering how much I understood about the way she felt—and perhaps, just how far I could be trusted with her confidences.

The only "movie star" touch in the entire room was an enormous vase of red roses—three dozen of them—on a table beside Betty. Lately, the papers had been full of her suddenly announced engagement to Charles Martin, the young radio executive who is as handsome as any movie star.

I said: "Betty, not to start your life story at the wrong end—but are you really planning to marry Charlie Martin?" And when she answered, I think you will understand what I mean about the unusual honesty of this girl.

"It isn't a publicity romance as many writers have insinuated," she said. "We are in love—or I am. But who knows what will eventually happen between two people rushed off their feet as Charlie and I were—falling in love at first sight—and then not seeing each other for weeks?

"I met him when I went to New York on my first bond tour," she went on. "I was on one of his radio shows. I thought he was the best looking and most attractive man I had ever seen—and ZOOM—it hit me just like that.

"It was like a skyrocket—falling in love like that. We were like a couple of zephyrs meeting head on. I was going to be in New York only a few days. We spent the entire time gazing into each other's eyes at every night spot in town.

"Then I had to come back to the Coast, and I didn't see him for weeks. But it was still ON—and when I went back to New York this last time, we announced our engagement. He asked me to marry him, and I said I would—right out loud in Madison Square Garden." Betty laughed.

"The second trip was almost a repetition of the first. Night clubs—photographers taking our pictures—still in the old spin. Then I was called back to Hollywood and since then we have been what Charlie calls a 'Coast-to-Coast' romance.

"It's funny to say it—but it's true. We don't know anything about each other—not really.

"Charlie will be out here in a few weeks with the Gertrude Lawrence radio show which he produces and writes—and then is when we will find out just how real it is. We will see each other in our work life and in our everyday life. Right now—neither of us knows."

The words had poured out of Betty's mouth as they always do when she talks and barely pausing for breath, she went on:

"Before people get married they should know each other from A to Z. It's all right to be in a spin, at first—it's grand. But marriage is something else. I've had a wonderful example right in my own home of how happy people can be when they are sure. My mother and stepfather went together for eighteen years before they were married a year and a half ago."

I laughed, "Well, I'd say they had a chance to get to know each other!"

A blonde head appeared around the swinging door of the kitchen. "Don't you believe it," said Mrs. Adams, who has a figure any glamour girl would be jealous of. "You never get to know any man! Eighteen years—or eighteen days—it's all the same!"

Betty hugged her knees and shrieked with laughter. "Isn't she wonderful?" she said as the kitchen door swung back. "I mean I would have to be awful darn sure of my happiness to leave Mom. You see, we've been through everything together."

Everything—to be exact—began back in Battle Creek, Michigan, on February 26th, 1921, the day Betty June Thornburg was born. From the moment Betty can remember anything—there were just the three of them—Mom and Marion, her sister who is two years older.

She has no memories of her father for the simple reason that he just wasn't around. When Betty was two and Marion, four, Mr. Thornburg (as Betty still thinks of her father) vanished into thin air. Where he went, or why, no one—not even Betty's mother—knows. He just walked out one day and never came back.

But "Mom," the slender blonde woman who was little more than a girl, herself, was always there like a guardian angel over her two little tow-headed girls. If any bitterness from the hardship of being left alone with two little children—and no money to support them—ever marked this extraordinary woman Betty calls "Mom"—it doesn't show. Her laughter comes as quickly as Betty's own. She talks her daughter's language. She might be an older sister.

She's proud of Betty but no more so than she is of Marion, now happily married, and the proud mother of a year old son. Marion, too, is a singer with Glenn Miller's band and Mrs. Adams keeps up Marion's scrapbook as carefully as she does Betty's. They both show you the new snapshots of Marion's baby with far more enthusiasm than they register over the new magazine portraits of the "mad" little Hutton.

But between the vivid girl and the woman who is her mother is an inescapable bond of two people who have literally gone through hell together — and weathered it with warmth and kindness toward the world. They have known what it means to go hungry—not to have enough to eat—no warm clothes to wear. They can joke about it now —but it is marked into them, holding them close together for as long as they shall live.

When Betty was six and Marion eight, "Mom" moved to Detroit. The big factories were there—the automobile factories where she could find work. The children were young to leave alone each day—but it was more important that they eat.

She got a job at the Chrysler factory for six months out of the year. Then there always came the black six months of the "lay off" known to all automobile workers—the long lay off while the new designs are being created and the factory slows down to a walk until the next "season."

But the tow-headed Betty June was not an unhappy little girl at heart —or never for very long at a time. She was the tom boy of the two sisters. In the summer time her face was just one big freckle.

"I was always scratched and bruised and rowdy," she says. "The only time I can remember being bored in my whole life was when my uncle gave me a doll to play with. I didn't know what to do with the darn thing."

If she didn't like dolls—she was crazy about real babies. For twenty-five cents an hour, Betty June "minded" the off-spring of young couples who wanted to go to the movies or to step out for an evening of dancing. Betty made up the formulas, fed them, and changed diapers like an expert.

"When I was back in Detroit on the Bond tour, some of those kids came to see me," Betty remembers. "Gee—was I glad to see they were nearly grown up—and I didn't have to change 'em!"

When Betty was 11 she made an interesting discovery about herself: she could sing. She and Marion sang all the new songs and by practicing a little, they worked in some "mean" close harmony. They were good! They were always asked to sing at the church and school entertainments. Everybody said it wasn't so much the way the kids sang—as all the antics they went through. The sisters turned cartwheels or chinned themselves while giving out with even the tenderest love lyrics. It made people laugh.

"We ought to get paid for this," Betty said to Marion.

"Who would pay us?" scoffed the older sister. "We're too young to get a job."

"Take up a collection," said the practical Betty.

They began to sing on the street corners and in the near-by beer gardens that the kids so elegantly thought of as "cafes." They sang their lungs out and danced their legs off. Saturdays were the best. Folks coming home on Saturdays have their pay in their pockets and sometimes they tossed as much as fifty cents on the corner pavements for the singing, dancing, whirling dervishes.

Sometimes they made as much as ten dollars! "Gee," breathed Betty—"if every day was Saturday—Mom would never have to work again!"

By the time she was fourteen—Betty was "show" mad. It was all she could think, talk, or dream about. She hounded her mother continually about getting in a show. "I know I could do it," she would say. "I'll die —if you don't let me try."

The "break" of all breaks occurred when an amateur band Betty had been singing with decided to try their wings in the Big Town. Two of the "musicians" mothers were going along as chaperones—and Mom finally gave her consent to her wild-eyed, nagging daughter to make the trip.

The first day Betty walked down Broadway she thought the little blue coat she was wearing couldn't hold her pounding heart. Why, the place was full of beer joints! But that was all behind her, now. She was a professional! That is, she would be a professional—soon. Maybe.

The days went by—as days have a habit of doing. Every morning Betty made the rounds of the booking agents. Someone had given her a list of the bigger and better agents and she made those rounds first. Soon, she was doing the smaller and lesser ones, as well. But if something didn't happen soon—it was just going to be too bad. She was down to her last five dollars—and then the last three dollars—and then the last one—and Broadway didn't even know she was there.

That was what maddened her. She was sure if the big producers just knew about her everything would be all right. Here she was fourteen years old—and nothing in sight. No one to talk to except those tired old men of "30 or 40" in the booking offices who seemed to think she was "just another singer."

It scares you when you are fourteen years old and you get down to your last dollar. It scares you even more when one of those tired old men of thirty or forty says:

"Listen, kid—I know you aren't twenty-one. You're just a little girl. You aren't foolin' anybody. Why don't you go home and wait awhile and start all over again in a few years?"

"I can't!" she sobbed. "I haven't even got enough money to go home. I'm the worst failure in the world!"

It was then that the tired "old man" —who didn't understand about potential Betty Huttons in the world—did a strange thing for a meanie. He dug down in his pocket and extracted a twenty-dollar bill. "It's just a loan," he said gently. "You can pay me back someday."

"I'll never be able to pay you back," Betty sobbed as though her heart would break. "I'm just a failure!"

"Well," he said, "take it, anyway. I'll feel better about you, knowing that you're being a failure back home —where you belong!"

LETTERS from our BOYS in the SERVICE

I want to write about one of the greatest movie actors the world has ever known. Mickey Rooney. When my outfit was stationed in California, Mickey put on a show. He sang and played the drums and piano, and did anything and everything that he was asked to do. His show was one of the largest we had seen out there, and he tried so hard to please the boys that when he finished, he was completely exhausted. I sincerely believe that of all the people who entertained for us, he received the greatest amount of applause.

PFC Ralph Liberato
Camp Bowie, Texas

Mickey Rooney, the playboy of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "Girl Crazy" musical.

We had no movie personalities visit our camp until one came a few weeks ago.

He was Mickey Rooney. To tell you the truth, I never was more surprised in all my life. I don't know what I expected to see in him, but whatever it was, it was wrong. He is about the grandest person I've seen on the stage.

We all thought his drum playing was publicity, but when we asked him to play the drums here at camp, I wasn't the only one who sat there with his mouth open in amazement. Mickey sure gave us a real show.

He was the first star I've seen, but I hope he isn't the last.

WORDS OF MUSIC

Dawn" was a long time in getting started, but now it looks set for a lengthy popularity run. It was written by Leon Rene, the composer of the always lovely "Sleepy Time Down South." Incidentally, there's a wonderful record of this tune, Capitol's disc by Ceelle Burke, who's been tabbed "The Sepia Frank Sinatra."

I know you've heard "Pistol Packin' Mamma" but here's a story about the song I don't think you've heard.

When Al Dexter was out in Hollywood I asked him how he happened to write it, where he got the idea, and all that. This is what he told me:

"Well, it was all the result of a dream. I dreamed one night that I left my house, telling my wife that I was going to a lodge meeting. But instead I went to a saloon and had myself a few beers. In that dream, I spied an attractive blonde in the corner, so I went over and asked her to dance.

"We had a few twirls around the floor and a few more beers, and I bade her goodnight and went home. The next night I left my house, again telling my wife that I was going to a lodge meeting.

"But I went straight back to the saloon and had some more beers. The same blonde was there, so we had a few more twirls, a few more beers, I bade her goodnight once more, and went home.

"The next night as I was leaving my house, I gave my wife the same story. But by this time she was getting suspicious of my routine, so she followed me to the saloon and caught me with the beers and the blonde. She simply pulled out a pistol and shot the blonde. Then I woke up."

I told Al I thought the story was more of a nightmare than a dream, but with his record royalties and his theatre dates at thirty-five hundred dollars a week and picture offers, all on the strength of "Pistol Packin' Mamma" I'd say it was darned nice dreamin'. . . .

The record has sold over a million copies . . . it's going so big, in fact, that Columbia has stopped pressing Harry James and Frank Sinatra discs for a while to catch up on the orders for "Mamma."

Our Jill, with Dick Hoymes. Jill interviewed Dick over the oir on o KFAC show.

With the crowd of young tons listening in, as Don Otis onnounces the progrom.

ON THE BEAM:

Johnnie Johnston nabbed the vocal spot on "Duffy's Tavern" when it returned to the air. He's one of the most consistently good singers in radio, and is featured in Paramount's musical films. . . .

The Blue Network's "What's New" program on Friday nights is one you should put on your "must" list every week. The show is sponsored by RCA-Victor and there is always a big musical star as guest, plus Don Ameche as master of ceremonies. . . .

Columbia Broadcasting Company is planning a build-up for Jerry Sullivan similar to the one they gave Dinah Shore. . . .

Bill Day, who has been singing with the Sportsmen Quartet, got a swell break, and is now the soloist on the Groucho Marx Saturday night show over CBS. . . .

You Glenn Miller fans probably have been listening to the Captain's Saturday NBC show, "I Sustain The Wings." Glenn has a forty piece orchestra augmented by an instrumental group known as "The Tail-end-Charlies," the service's phrase for the tail gunner assigned to the last bomber of a formation. The "Charlies" are comprised of such familiar names as Corporal Ray McKinley on drums, Corporal Mel Powell (formerly with Benny Goodman) on piano, Sergeant Trigger Alpert (with Miller's civilian band) on bass, and Private Carmen Mastren on guitar. . . .

Eddie Cantor has a real find in his new vocal miss, Nora Martin. She used to be a hill-billy singer. . . . The Blue Network has signed Andy Russell with big plans in mind for him. Andy has been playing drums and singing with Alvino Rey. . . . Dick Haymes continues to do a good job on his "Here's To Romance" show over CBS, and the demand for tickets when Dick came to Hollywood was something.

Which reminds me, I'm so glad Frank Sinatra has been singing "Pistol Packin' Mamma," and for one reason—it's a jump tune. I've always enjoyed Frank on a rhythm song, but since he left Dorsey, he's done nothing but ballads, and he can swing with the best of them. . . .

Bob Crosby's Sunday night NBC effort is an all-music show that has improved considerably. Plus Bob and the band, there are the Pied Pipers and a guest canary each week. . . .

JAM NOTES:

When Charlie Spivak came to Hollywood Palladium, he broke every existing opening night record for the place, which was amazing inasmuch as he topped such record breakers as the Brothers Dorsey, Benny Goodman and Woody Herman, and it was his first visit to the coast.

But I suppose it really isn't so amazing, because he has one of the finest bands I've ever heard. I don't see how he can miss being Number One next year. He is billed as "The Man Who Plays The Sweetest Trumpet In The World" and it's no exaggeration.

I've never watched anyone play an instrument with as much ease and relaxation. His tone is so beautiful, yet not lacking in brilliance. The whole band swings, not just the rhythm section, and the saxes play with such a beat. Charlie, himself, is one of the nicest guys I've ever known in the music business. His beautiful wife, Fritzi, is expecting a baby and they are hoping for a little "Pin-Up" girl. They already have an eight-year-old son, Joel.

While on the coast, Charlie replaced The Stardusters with Irene Daye. Irene had planned on doing radio work only, but the Spivak offer was too tempting.

Here's an amusing thing. On either side of the large ballroom of the Palladium there are two huge statues which are as tall as the balcony. The balcony runs clear around each side of the ballroom, with smaller statues here and there.

Now Charlie had never been in the spot before his opening, and around eleven o'clock that evening the manager came and told him he had broken the record.

Charlie looked up toward the balcony and said, "Gee, those aren't all statues up there, some of them must be people." . . .

While awaiting his new trial, Gene Krupa played two weeks of USO shows with Benny Goodman, and then went home to Yonkers, New York. He has been studying piano and taking drum lessons from Sol Goodman, the New York Philharmonic drummer. . . .

Mary Lou Cook has left the Merry Macs and settled down to being a housewife. She was replaced by Marjorie Garland (no relation to Judy). The youngest "Mac," Joe, was drafted and Lynn Allen took his place. . . . Mary O'Brien, Virginia's kid sister, has been signed by Universal Pictures. She sings too. . . . Skip Nelson has left Tommy Dorsey and gone into radio. I caught him recently on a Blue Network sustainer. . . .

Bill Finegan, former Glenn Miller arranger responsible for so many of Miller's hit records, has joined T.D. He was with Horace Heidt for a short time. . . .

Don't be surprised if Helen Forrest leaves Harry James around the first of the year and goes out on her own, even though she has denied it. She has signed a managerial contract with Billy Burton, who also handles Jimmy Dorsey, Helen O'Connell and Dick Haymes.

And speaking of Haymes, when Dick arrived in Hollywood he was met at the train by his wife and a studio representative, a small reception committee in contrast to the hundreds who met Sinatra. However, that's the way Dick wanted it. When I met him at the Palladium the other night I was impressed with how much he looked like the captain of the basketball team at school. He seems like a nice guy who is genuinely thrilled with his success. He told me it made him happy to have all the waiters and doormen so glad to see him and it was just like old home week renewing acquaintances with the Palladium crowd, all of whom he hadn't seen since his Dorsey engagement. . . .

Maurice Rocco, the colored pianist, has been signed by Paramount for a spot in one of their forthcoming musicals. . . .

Harry James and Freddy Martin garnered over three million dollars for the Third War Loan Drive with their baseball game. Harry's team won, twelve to two. During the festivities Wifey Betty Grable auctioned off a pair of her nylon stockings to the tune of forty thousand dollars. Betty always ribs Harry because of his passion for baseball, calling him "Three-Bagger Harry."

Then that forthright Bergman radiance: "Not at all. I shall be happy!"

Thus I had met Ilsa and Clio and Maria and Marie-Veronica. Four unrelated fictional women. And they were all Ingrid Bergman.

SHE was promptly ready at seven o'clock next morning for the two hour drive to Chicago City, where she was spending several days as a guest on the Swenson farm. The hotel had assigned her to what they called The Nordic Suite. I made some remark about how appropriate this was, but she laughingly assured me that the name was the only thing Nordic about it. Immensely enjoying the misnomer, she called my attention to Chinese carvings, Louis Quatorze chairs, and Grand Rapids bedsteads. "But it is so big and so comfortable," she said, whereupon she proceeded to turn out the several floor and wall lights. I hastened to assure her that such economy was unnecessary; eventually the maid would turn them out, and besides, people never bothered to turn out hotel lights, anyhow.

"Oh, yes, I know," she said, "but still I do not feel right about it."

Arriving at the Swenson farm she was immediately put to work on the film, and, except for a brief pause for luncheon, kept at it with undiminishing enthusiasm and energy until sundown. That night the red earmuffs I had purchased ceased becoming the subject of conversation among the director and crew; it was now the astonishing spirit and exuberance of Bergman; the utter absence of temperament or pose; the crisp, fresh quality matched only by the deep untouched snow that blanketed Minnesota.

An assistant cameraman borrowed an old vaudeville gag, but when he said it, everybody looked at him as if he had said all there was to say. "And to think I'm getting paid for this," he said.

THE next day two incidents occurred which shall always remain with your chronicler. Both should have a permanent place in any critical examination of Bergman. The first took place at the Old People's Home. The matron ushered us into a small living-room, and we found ourselves looking into the serenely furrowed faces of several aged men and women. The matron was about to introduce Bergman when that young lady, catching her breath at sight of this human dignity, suddenly and impulsively fell upon her knees and grasped the hand of the woman nearest her, instantly engaging her in Swedish conversation.

The response of these wonderful people was thrilling. The vision of this actress, destined to become the screen's greatest, kneeling in humility and adoration before these men and women at the midnight of their lives, was a thing of complete magnificence.

Later, on our way down the slippery walk, I took her arm, searching for something to say. I thought how perfectly she belonged against a background of snow. Her close-cropped sage-honey hair and cheeks that had a permanent flush like the inside of a sea-shell. She sensed my unspoken question.

She said, "I love old people. I can not help it. I love them more than any other. When I was a child, they were kind to me—my dearest memories are of old people."

From the Old People's Home we went to a small house in Scandia. The script called for a scene showing an eighty-nine-year-old Swedish woman working at an ancient spinning wheel. Ingrid Bergman sat beside her and watched the tender, sere, and yellow leaf of her hands as she spinned the thread.

Bergman was fascinated by the efficiency of the small hands palsied by time. "Please show me how you do it," she said, and the immigrant child of 1868 proceeded to show her. She smiled a wrinkled smile at the glowing young face beside her. "What is your name?" she said simply. This was a person she liked and approved. This was her stamp of approval. Instantly, without looking up from the whirling thread, and with a simplicity to match the old lady's, the star of "Casablanca" and "Saratoga Trunk" said:

"Ingrid."

FOLLOWED days full of incidents revealing the luminous Bergman facets.

Ignorant of her personal habits, I once offered her a cigaret. "Oh, no. Thank you," she said.

"I'm sorry," I said, feeling curiously guilty.

"Please don't mind," she said, reassuring me with that copyrighted smile. "I don't mind others smoking, but I do not like it for myself. I have learned to chew gum because while my friends smoke, I want to do something, too."

Members of the crew overheard her and from that day on, whenever chewing gum was seen on sale, each man bought his quota of one package and presented it to her. Bergman was supplied for weeks to come.

One evening we returned to Minneapolis, and we discussed the problem of dining. "Perhaps a Swedish restaurant," I suggested. Her blue-gray eyes pleaded for understanding. "I have eaten Swedish food all my life," she said, "and I like it very much. But I want to know all about other foods, too. I want to try every kind of food. I want to know all about them."

We arrived at the hotel, and I asked her what time I should call for her. "Fifteen minutes," she said. I am sure I looked incredulous, but she seemed not to notice. "Okay," I said and went to my own room, wondering how the devil I could change my clothes and be ready in fifteen minutes.

I talked to myself all the time I engaged in the fastest quick-change act of my life. "Hmmm. She's been working all day. She's all bundled up in sweaters and ski shoes and things. She's been riding back for the last two hours. No, I must have misunderstood. She said fifty minutes, not fifteen."

But my hearing has never failed me, and I was sure she said fifteen. Just for meanness I would call for her in fifteen minutes.

And I did. And she answered the door, as bright and trim as cut glass.

"You're not true!" I declared. in self-defense. "You're entirely fictitious!"

"But why?"

"Because no woman can execute such a transformation under two hours—and for a screen star!"

"I do not understand," she said. "Why should it take so . . . ?"

As we descended in the elevator, I looked at her vivid coloring. I took several looks at her lips. I recalled David Selznick's telling me that soon after he first met her, he touched his fingers to her lips to see how much rouge she used. There was none. So now I knew why Ingrid Bergman could get dressed in fifteen minutes. I was now beginning to find out something about beauty.

On the fifth day, our work finished, we bade goodbye to the Swensons and the snowdrifts and the incomparable sweet butter. We returned to our hotel in Minneapolis about five o'clock, with three hours to spare before train time. I suggested that it would be wisest to pack our luggage, have dinner at leisure, and then catch the train.

Bergman agreed, and I asked her approximately how much time she would require. When should I call for her? She studied a moment, pondering the length of time it would take to pack the three bags which had served the needs of her four-year-old daughter, Pia, the child's colored maid, Mabel, and herself.

"I shall be ready in forty minutes," she said. And I went to my room and proceeded to cram shaving, bathing, and packing into the allotted time.

Precisely forty minutes later, embarrassed that an unencumbered man couldn't achieve such commonplace functions within a reasonable length of time, my phone rang. It was Bergman. And for the first time her voice was plaintive. It was commingled chagrin, defeat, and despair.

"This time I can not do it," she said. "It is too much. I am standing on my head, and still it does no good!"

WE finally made the train and began a journey to be remembered. But first you must know that for two weeks I had tried without success to improve our Pullman reservations. No luck, we had to be satisfied with three roomettes. One for the two lovely Bergmans, one for Mabel, and one for me. To properly visualize the problem at hand one must picture trying to sleep in a cell about the size of two telephone booths.

Despite a night that seemed as if I were sleeping on a streetcar that stopped at every corner, I managed to fall into a heavy slumber and awoke at ten. I dressed and immediately went to see how Bergman fared. Finding her door closed, I looked in on the maid. There was little Pia, bright and cheery.

I said, "How did Miss Bergman get along?"

"Oh, she had a terrible time," said Mabel. "She couldn't sleep with Pia without crowding her, so she got up and walked up and down the train. Soon as Pia got up, Miss Bergman went to bed."

Towards the middle of the afternoon I saw Bergman and demanded an explanation, but she tried to make light of her night's experience. "Please don't worry," she said. "I am all right. The motion of the train kept throwing me against Pia, and I could not sleep. So I got up, put on my robe, and walked through the train. Everything was blacked out, and I could see nothing outside. So I went to the dining car. I thought maybe I could sleep in a chair, but there was a nice old man there, and we talked for about an hour. He was interesting."

"Nevertheless," I said, in righteous manly wrath, "tonight you will take my roomette and I shall do the patrolling."

A PERSON'S behavior under stress is the only true gauge of character. Nothing original or brilliant in that observation, but one more incident happened on the journey to Hollywood, both amusing and revelatory, which throws a bright light on this Bergman.

The endless lines of hungry soldiers and civilians frequently meant two hours of waiting for a meal which was inevitably shrunken by the early birds. Discouraged by our experience and stung by our hunger, we held a war council.

This unadmirable Crichton struggled for a solution, when suddenly Bergman's face beamed with a great discovery. "I have it!" she said. "The Swensons gave me two pounds of cheese to take home. I have it with me, in my bag!"

But what to do about bread? We couldn't keep eating unadorned cheese. That was too easy. The train stopped at every obscure village for at least ten minutes. We would be ready, and when the train stopped, we would run to the station, buy several sandwiches, milk or cokes, and any fruit or candy we could find. The sandwiches, of course, would be unfit for consumption. But we could throw out the filling and eat the bread with the cheese.

The plan nearly ended in disaster. For when the train stopped, the station was about nine cars ahead. By the time we reached the station, put in our grub for the winter, and emerged, the conductor was fog-horning, "All abawd!" and the porters were closing their gates.

Bergman looked up at me frantically.

"Can you run?" I asked.

"Try me," she said, and we ran the length of nine cars, arms laden with precious sustenance, and a baby on the train utterly oblivious that her mama was almost left behind.

This, then, was Bergman. Sometimes I think she's the most beautiful woman I have ever seen. If what I have told you is not beauty, ultimate beauty, then my forty years and more have been meaningless and I have learned nothing.

BIG NIGHT AT THE CANTEEN

WHEN the several hundred British soldiers touring our country on behalf of the War Department arrived in Hollywood, of course they had to visit the Canteen. And equally of course, the stars, particularly the British ones, turned out en masse to welcome them. Here are a few scenes of that heartwarming international event.

Hedy Lamarr didn't have to entertain. No, just looking at her was enough to make these smiling Tommies give out with some English-accent exclaiming. But raw-ther!

It's Bob Hope, down in the middle of this mob. And whatever he just said, it was making a hit with the boys. "Gee," says Bob. "Was I really as funny as all that?"

Cary Grant, Irene Manning, and Helmut Dantine, waiting to take part in the show. Like waiting in line to see a movie, their fans might say. And boy, what a cast!

Hollywood society, sliced as Paul Henreid with the Basil Rathbones, front row; Michael (author of the "Green Hat") Arlen, Paulette Goddard, Errol Flynn.

Here's a closeup of Paulette, showing how she wears her draped evening cloak, her gloves and jewels. Glamorous, wot?

HOLLYWOOD

GOES TO THE 'ICE FOLLIES' OPENING

Ever since Sonja Henie brought her silver skates to Flickerville, the movie colony has been ice-ballet crazy. The Ice Follies, a yearly institution, always draws the glitter crowd. Their most recent opening was particularly colorful, as you can see herewith.

She's Nora McCarthy, this pretty skater. And here she is, taking Charlie's place on Bergen's knee.

Those great friends and co-workers, Bob Hope and Frances Langford, back from camp tours. And with them is Frances' husband, Jon Hall.

The always beaming Chester Morrises. And who's to say what they're turning to see. A late arrival? Good guess, you're right!

Another wonderful looking pair, always completely blissful in one another's company, Mr. and Mrs. Alan Marshall.

This dark-haired belle with her soldier hubby used to be that cute blonde, Jane Wyman. And doesn't Lt. Reagan get handsomer all the time?

Betty Grable, gay mother-to-be, is swarmed by fans in the audience. Husband Harry James, at her left.

in costume. I have heard that tests made in New York are not taken very seriously in Hollywood. Isn't that so?" Katina asked, turning to me.

As she put me on the spot, there was nothing to do but for me to back her up. "I believe tests made in California are better," I answered, avoiding the director's angry glare.

There followed much discussion about the test. But Katina remained firm, and in the end she had her way. She was to appear first as she was and introduce herself. "I am Katina Paxinou. And although I have never been before a camera, I will give you my impression of what 'Pilar' looks like—" was the text of her short speech. After this she was to leave the screen and reappear as the Hemingway character and silently stroll and gesticulate as would the Spanish guerrilla leader.

Having agreed to let her do as she pleased, the men left more hopeful than when they entered. Katina was radiant. She began gathering up her photographs and books and told me to fetch the flowers. As we walked down the corridor, I finally summoned the courage to ask about this Tommy that had been worrying me.

"Just wait until you meet him—he's bigger than you." I didn't speak and she laughed uproariously. "Ah, but you are 'drole,'" she giggled and opened her door. A faint odor of cooking stew greeted my nostrils as I crossed the threshold. "It is our dinner you smell—the hotel is afraid to object until I pay my bill," Katina informed me when the biggest Great Dane I have ever seen came leaping toward me. So this is Tommy, I thought, greatly relieved until he playfully knocked me down, strewing flowers all over the small room.

"Oh dear," Katina exclaimed, "and they belong to the hotel."

Although my first introduction to Tommy was so overwhelming, we were to become great friends. A present to Katina from Dimitri Mitropoulos, the renowned Greco-American conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, Tommy is more than just a dog.

"You've spoiled him," I told Katina one day when he ate her other hat. Instead of scolding him, she threw her arms around his bull-like neck and squeezed him so hard that he squeaked like one of his heroes.

"What would I have done without him?" she said releasing her strangle hold. "Dimitraki," as she affectionately calls Mitropoulos, "knew I needed a friend and gave me Tommy. What a consolation he was during those winter months when everything seemed black. The night I received word from Washington that my husband had been captured for the second time trying to make his escape from Greece, only Tommy's presence helped me live through that night." She suddenly threw off her mood of depression. "My husband will adore him, but I will have to hide Tommy's stews until Alexis forgets some of the starvation he has seen in Athens."

Katina beamed, having received news that her husband had succeeded in his third attempt to escape the Nazis and was now safe in Cairo waiting his turn to board a plane for the United States.

"God knows what he will look like when he arrives in this blessed country, after what he has been through—I dread to see him."

A few days before I was to leave for California again, Alexis reached New York. Beside wishing to meet the husband of Katina, I was interested in hearing of his miraculous escape and an eye-witness account of the horrible conditions in Greece.

I arranged with Katina to meet them in a little restaurant in Greenwich Village for dinner.

As I expected to see anything but a normal healthy looking man of medium height and strong stocky build, I must have shown my surprise when we were introduced. In the way that Katina said, "This is Teddy," and the warm manner that Alexis shook my hand, I knew that Katina had told him her favorite story—the elaborately dramatized version of how I told her to duck just in time to avoid being hit by a heavy iron pulley which was swinging dangerously over her head when our life-boat was being lowered from the torpedoed ship. To hear Katina tell it, I fought off a school of sharks and, like Superman, swam to safety with her in my arms, some two hundred miles away.

In any event, it served its purpose. Because, usually shy with strangers, Alexis was unusually communicative.

He told us of how, after having spent many weeks in a concentration camp for his two previous attempts and his refusal to play in "Faust" for the Germans, he finally managed his escape in a small caique hidden beneath a pyramid of cement bags. He told of the horrors he witnessed under the new order—the mass executions, the starving children crawling through the streets of Athens, the thud of a body falling to the pavement being such a familiar sound that no one turns to see who it is.

"But you look so amazingly well, considering what you have been through," I remarked.

He took his passport from his pocket and showed me the photograph attached to it. In the emaciated face there wasn't a sign of resemblance to the man seated at my side. "That is what I looked like when I reached Egypt six weeks ago," he smiled.

I was still staring unbelievingly at the picture when the waiter served the thick steaks I had ordered. Alexis looked for a moment at the food in front of him, then his mouth began to twitch. Katina reached for his hand as the tears suddenly poured from his eyes. Suddenly none of us was very hungry. We toyed with our food for more than an hour, then silently drove back to the hotel.

"I'm afraid I've ruined your evening," Alexis apologized as I accompanied them into the lobby. "Perhaps in time I will learn to act calmly at the sight of food."

"Madame," a clerk at the desk called to Katina, "a man from Paramount has been trying to get hold of you all evening. He wants you to call him the moment you get in."

Katina was very pale as she entered the telephone booth. Alexis and I turned away.

"She will get the part," I said, "you will see."

"Such things only happen in books, my friend," Alexis replied. "I wish all of this hadn't happened—Katina is bound to be hurt."

While he was speaking, I saw Katina running toward us. "I have to go to Hollywood," she panted. "I have to leave tomorrow night."

Poor Alexis. Separated from his wife for more than three years, going through horrors to get to her, and twenty-four hours after their reunion she leaves for California! He was unable to accompany her because he had to report to Washington to do Greek propaganda, and there await the arrival of his King, who was expected the following week.

Happy and gay as she waved him goodbye on the platform, Katina's seemingly high spirits left her the moment she entered the train.

"Come, come, Katina," I said, "there is no need to feel depressed."

She heaved a sigh and exhaustedly dropped onto the seat. "It would be wonderful, wouldn't it?" she smiled wearily.

"What do you mean wonderful, wouldn't it?"

"It is not certain that I will play 'Pilar.'"

I looked at her aghast. "But you said—"

"That everything was already signed and sealed," she said finishing for me. She closed her eyes, rubbed her forehead before continuing. "I lied—but it was worth it. You saw how Alexis reacted. I am going to Hollywood to do another test. In place of a contract I have only my expenses and my hopes."

"But suppose—" I began when she put up her hand to stop me.

"It is better not to suppose," she said, and then clenched her fists. "I will play 'Pilar'—I must and I will."

When we reached Hollywood, I accompanied Katina to Paramount where Sam Wood, the director, waited to test-view her. I remember Katina wore a white silk shirt and a cardinal red pullover which made her look even less than her one hundred and fifteen pounds. Mr. Wood made no attempt to hide his surprise when she entered his office. He knitted his brow as if to say, "If this is a joke, I am not amused." Then he began the over familiar routine of discussing the characteristics of the role, making suggestions for costumes and makeup, and ended by telling her to be ready for the test in a few days.

Somewhat bewildered, but more determined than ever to play the role, Katina started out through the labyrinth of buildings on the Paramount lot to find the costume department, see Wally Westmore about makeup, and finally discuss the terms of her contract, in case she was awarded the role.

In the following days Katina experienced the tortures of the damned, perfecting her English diction, being madeup, being costumed. Till when the day arrived for her to step onto the set and make the test with Gary Cooper, it was with superhuman effort that she managed to control her trembling limbs. Sam Wood, waiting beside the camera, was to see her for the first time as "Pilar."

Katina stopped in front of him, placed her hands on her hips, planted her feet firmly on the ground, and almost defiantly waited for him to give his verdict. The set was crowded with the curious who had come to watch the test of still another "Pilar," and the tense silence that prevailed while Mr. Wood studied her critically made me hold my breath.

Suddenly his voice broke the stillness as he turned and called "Camera." An excited murmur ran through the crowd. "Silence," Wood called again, and then turned to Katina. "Madame, we will now begin."

It is the scene where Gary Cooper as "Robert Jordan" meets "Pilar" for the first time. He is on the set when he hears "Pilar's" formidable voice shouting to Maria off-stage. "Who is that?" Jordan asks the Gypsy.

"That is the woman of 'Pablo,'" the Gypsy answers. And then Katina, hearing her cue, strode onto the set.

From that very moment Katina's fate had been decided upon.

"I hope you made a good deal when you discussed your contract," Wood remarked when she stepped off the set.

"You mean you think—" Katina stammered.

He patted her on the back encouragingly. "I wish I could find the sucker who would take my bet to the contrary," he smiled.

THE other day I stopped by to see Katina in her little white house in Beverly Hills. As usual, Tommy almost knocked me over when I walked in. "Where's your mother and father?" I asked him, when I found that the house was deserted. In reply, he bounded through the hall out into the back garden. Following him, I found Katina and Alexis busily at work in their Victory garden.

"Come, see how my corn and my carrots and my salad have grown," Katina called to me.

"Her corn and her carrots and her salad," Alexis repeated, laboriously getting up from his knees.

"Well, the salad is mine, isn't it?" Katina argued. "I planted the potatoes, too."

"Sure, and look at them," Alexis said, pointing to a few drooping weeds.

Insisting that I stay to dinner, they proudly showed me the wonders of their garden, in which geraniums and roses grew in profusion. Katina contentedly surveyed the scene, Tommy sprawled at her feet, and Alexis had his arm around her waist.

"You like it here in Hollywood, don't you?" I asked.

"It reminds me of Greece," Katina answered, "like the Greece that will soon be liberated."

THE END

KATINA COMES TO AMERICA

Summary of the story told by Terence Kennedy in Part One.

It was in London in 1939, when the bombs were falling. Terence Kennedy, author, met Katina Paxinou, actress—in a raid shelter.

His story of her coming to America is no second-hand dramatization. Kennedy was actually with Paxinou when she went through those submarine raids and bomber attacks. When she was rescued from a lifeboat, as one of the survivors from a torpedoed ship, and had the experience of being the only woman aboard an English destroyer.

Then the Duchess of Kent summoned her to Buckingham Palace, as Kennedy tells it. And the royal visit resulted in arrangements for Clipper passage for the pair from London to the United States.

Arriving in New York, where Katina was to make her American debut in the title role of "Electra," the Greek star had but thirty-eight cents in her pocket. And then more bad luck—the death of the producer who was to have started her career in this country.

Now continue with her story, as it takes you—and Paxinou—to Hollywood. For the role of Pilar.

JACK BENNY IN ITALY

so fast that we had hardly time to think," said Jack. "There was one moment I shall never forget, when Hollywood, and Mary, and Joan, seemed so very far away, and when I suddenly found the true meaning of the words terra firma, when I knew what it really meant to be scared.

"At eight thousand feet we were rapidly approaching the Persian Gulf area when the pilot said curtly: 'Sandstorm ahead. Hold on to your seats, fellas!' And then suddenly we were in it. My first impulse was to laugh. I remembered those synthetic sandstorms on the sound stages, the propellers whirring, buckets of sand being emptied into containers, the eddying winds whipping the extras' legs.

"But this was different. Where there had been light, a strange, terrifying darkness came, the darkness of a tremendous, black cloud. In less than a minute it was on us, beating a tattoo on the roof of the plane like a hail storm. The sandstorm drew a curtain over the windows of the plane and, between the roar of the motors, and the whining and screeching of the storm, we couldn't make ourselves heard. Not that any one of us wanted to talk very much . . .

"The pilot shot us a grin. We needed that tonic, and he knew it. 'We're going to land' he said. What an optimist! Every time we tried, the wind would toss us back; harder and harder the sand dashed at the windows, and there were a thousand questions that we wanted to ask like, 'Is the stuff gathering on the wings? Is that one of the motors gone dead? What was that sudden ping? Had something given way?' But we just waited, watching the plane trying to land time and time again. Several times it seemed we had made it when we were thrown back again, climbing higher and higher, trying to escape the storm, trying to come down another way. We lived through an hour that way.

"Finally, thanks to the expert navigation of the pilot, plus the superb maneuverability of the ship, we made it, and the world we came down to was paradise in comparison. Yet actually the Persian Gulf area, where we played all the camps we could, is that God-forsaken part of the world in which the men are stationed to expedite the supply line to Russia—and where the temperature varies between 140 and 180.

"Once we gave three shows there, at ten o'clock in the morning, when the mercury hit 150! In this area it's a court martial offense to be out between 1:00 and 4:00 p.m. In command of this area was General Connolly, and one day he asked us to come up to a new camp—Camp Gifford—which was to be dedicated that morning. The camp was named after a private who had died during valorous conduct in the line of duty.

"It was there that we went on one of the most revealing stages of our trip. They had arranged a series of bus-trains with seats in them—and had thrown the doors wide open—and so we found ourselves traveling in something very much like the sight-seeing trains that ply up and down rivers during a regatta.

"There, in all its aspects, we saw the wonderful job these boys were doing in this non-combat zone: the feeding and keeping open of the immense supply network that made the war in the Eastern hemisphere possible. No glory for these boys, who would rather be on combat duty, no decorations, no glamorous citations, but merely the knowledge that theirs is a cog without which the war could not be fought, let alone won."

Jack went on to say how glad they were to play in this section, because they soon found out that was where the boys got the least entertainment, and yet it was one of the places where they needed it the most. After each show Jack, and the other members of the troop, were surrounded by the men hungry for news from home. They wanted to know whether the girls were still wearing silk stockings, whether their hair was long, short, bobbed, or pinned up—and whether or not the hats were still crazy.

"Incidentally," chuckled Jack, "I had a line in the show, 'Fellas, nothing has changed since you left. Roosevelt is still President, and Ann Sheridan is still beautiful, and—Fred Allen is still inodiferous.' Only the word wasn't inodiferous. How they loved it!"

Among all his varied and exciting experiences Jack Benny will never get over his amazement at how, in such faroff places, the boys in army exile still manage to keep up with things. For instance when the Jack Benny troop, which included Wini Shaw and Larry Adler, arrived in the Persian Gulf area they were greeted by a lot of British, American and Russian soldiers leading a mule with "Fred Allen" printed on its rear end.

Several times the party had landed at some almost inaccessible, uncivilized spot only to find big signs reading, "To Waukegan." In one place an arch had been constructed with huge letters identifying it as "Waukegan Airport." To say nothing of that one spot in Cairo where the boys decorated the theater with the words, "Jack Benny Slept Here, Ate Here, Lived Here!"

Said Jack, "They all, bless their hearts, wanted to know about Rochester, and what he was doing during the summer, and whether Priscilla Lane was as beautiful off the screen as she was on, how Betty Grable came to marry Harry James and so on and so on. But in Brazil they were more worried than curious, wondering whether Orson Welles mightn't object to wifey Rita Hayworth's being their pin-up girl!"

Then, in that all-important brief pause in which Jack Benny ordered another chopped-chicken liver sandwich, I asked him slyly, "How did your Stradivarius bear up?"

"Very well," said Jack, his voice taking on a warm note. "The boys were very appreciative when they found that I could play my fiddle a little bit better than my familiar 'Love in Bloom' style. Once on the trip it got lost, when my three grips were missing in a change of planes. And then, of course, there was always someone planning to see that it got really lost, and stayed lost." Jack shrugged. "That I suppose is the burden any great virtuoso has to bear."

The most exciting part of Jack's journey took place in Italy. There were certain troops that they had meant to play to in Africa, but Jack's company found those boys had already been shipped to Sicily. So Jack and company then went to Sicily, and learned that these troops, which they had missed in Africa, were stationed at a place called Lentini. So they went on to Lentini, only to find that these same troops had by then moved on to a spot that can't be revealed by name.

Jack said, "We requested permission to follow our illusive audience, only we couldn't go through the usual channels, and had to get this permission from the Commanding Officer at Lentini. He agreed, explaining that we would be the first entertainers to go into Italy, and he said that he would radio on ahead and see that we were expected. Furthermore, we would be met by an escort of planes, so that we could not be shot at by either the enemy, or by our own troops not recognizing our plane.

"Of course, the inevitable happened. The escort planes never got around to meeting us and, throughout the trip, we sat on the edge of our seats, just waiting for trouble. Fortunately it never happened, but were we glad when we finally landed! At the air field a Major came up and said, 'I'm Major So-and-So. Who're you?' I said, 'I'm Jack Benny.' He stared incredulously, 'What the hell are you doing here?' The word had not gotten through at all that we were coming, and that the sky around was alive with enemy marauders!"

Because the troops that the Jack Benny unit had come to entertain were due for another immediate move, into the actual battle zone, the Major thought it would be wonderful for the boys to see Jack's show. So time was called out for just that! Ninety minutes later the men went into that battle. The place? Salerno!

"And I on the other hand went into a nice siege of cold, bordering on pneumonia," Jack said. "They put me in a small hospital at Palermo, and kept me there for days."

Before leaving on this memorable trip Jack was a little worried that his type of humor might not go over with some of the audiences. He had long heard of the differences between English and American humor. "You can imagine my relief when I found out that the Tommies were laughing as hard as the Yanks," he said. "From the moment I remarked 'We could have breakfast in Accra, lunch in Benghasi, and—dysentry in Tripoli, we were in!"

I asked Jack who was the most interesting person he had met over there. "Not one, but two," he said, instantly. "The first was Henrietta Szold, the 82-year-old lady who has done so much for the Zionist movement, a fabulous person who was very quiet, but very direct. She had said to me, 'Why did you want to meet me?' I answered that I had read about her in Wendell Willkie's book. 'Oh,' she answered, '—and could you tell me what Mr. Willkie wanted to meet me for?'

"As for the other," continued Jack, "that was General Patton, one of the most colorful characters I have ever encountered. He talks only about the war, indulging in a string of profanity about the things that bother him, gets very factual about how tacticians should carry on, and in the very next minute he will talk about his men. Then, discussing how he had recognized a dead soldier on the field, he would cry like a baby. A remarkable and truly wonderful man."

Finally, with twelve weeks gone by all too quickly, the trip was over, and Jack Benny's party made ready to leave Europe—and over half a million grateful soldiers. Late on a Sunday afternoon they left Marrakesh, Morocco, and headed for home. Late Tuesday night they arrived in New York, and in the intervening period they were so excited and happy during the night—and so busy during the day—they didn't sleep at all.

"We were in Scotland on Monday, Iceland on Tuesday, where immediately after breakfast we played three shows, and finally late Tuesday night we reached New York where I couldn't wait to get my first chopped chicken liver sandwich."

THE END

LOUISE ALLBRITTON'S LIFE WITH FATHER

"Next year, as usual, I considered my allowance entirely too small. I'll admit now that I was extravagant. When I couldn't meet my bills, I pawned my one valuable ring, redeeming it when Father's check came. I did this three times. At Easter, Father suddenly came to see me and found me ringless. I couldn't tell him what I'd done, so I said it was at the jeweler's, leaving him to suppose it needed some small repair. He went to the jeweler's and came back with the ring. I'm sure he must have known that it had been pawned but he said nothing, and neither did I, but I decided I hadn't been playing fair, and for the first time I began to budget my expenses.

IT was about this time that the teachings of both parents suddenly blended.

Louise's mother may have cared little about finances, but she cared a lot about voices and accents. Yet her daughter had the most Southern of Southern accents, and she talked at the top of her lungs. "I went screaming through life," says Louise. "I spoke too fast, and my words ran together. Mother couldn't stand it. She sent me to the dramatic coach at Junior High for lessons in diction. He made me read aloud from Shakespeare and Moliere, and I discovered I liked it."

She joined the dramatic society, played starring roles and after school studied with a small theater guild. Because her father failed to approve of her dramatic ventures, he sent her to the University of Oklahoma.

After two years in college, Universal's future star decided to go to Pasadena, California, to study for the stage at the Playhouse under Gilmor Brown. Mr. Allbritton was stunned, and raised every objection, but Louise explained that she would live on a budget, and that she'd never get into debt, that it was the only thing she cared for and life would be bleak and barren waste if she had to give it up. Finally her father consented, handing her out a very limited allowance.

For the first year, like all Playhouse students, she lived in a dormitory. It was far from luxurious. The Playhouse hours were long and arduous, but Louise was happy. The second year she took a room at a Mrs. Tea's house; both years she budgeted carefully, so much for room and board, so much for carfare, so much for school expenses and costumes. Even at that she just got by.

"At home, Father had been determined that I should learn at least one thing every summer during vacation time," confided Louise. "I had to learn how to make beds and keep house—I made every bed in the house one whole summer! I had to cook one meal a day another summer. I chose lunch because that would be easiest, but it was hard enough! I remember the cook wouldn't eat it—she cooked her own and probably provided food for the other servants, but the family ate mine.

"Then I had to learn to market, to draw up menus, to plan a budget for food. I love expensive food, so it was a good thing to learn to plan meals for a week that would keep within the amount my father gave me to spend. I discovered that if I paid a lot for filet mignon, I'd have to economize on dessert; if I went in for early strawberries and fresh asparagus, I must choose a cheaper cut of meat, and so on. I learned not to buy poor stuff, but to choose good food that happened to be in season or unusually plentiful.

"I learned how to do everything that must be done in a house, including managing servants, paying them, seeing that all work was well done, and so on. I wasn't Father's little sunshine while I was learning all this in those long summer days—I simply hated it and felt terribly abused—but I'm glad now. I wouldn't give up that training for anything."

LOUISE completed the Pasadena Playhouse two-year course and stayed on for two more years in order to play leads with Gilmor Brown in a succession of modern and classical plays. She planned to go to New York when the final production, "Philadelphia Story," finished its run.

the stage and come home, so again we were feuding," said Louise. "You never saw such people for feuding as Father and I! When we are together, we never say a word to each other that's out of the way, but when we're apart we write the most insulting letters you ever read. I suppose it's because we understand each other that we finally take it with a laugh.

"At any rate, here we were in a high feud; I was loftily sending back Father's checks, Mrs. Tea (the darling) was letting my bill run on and on, and I was borrowing a little change for carfare. I don't know how it would have ended if Columbia Studios hadn't wanted me for a part in 'Parachute Nurse' at seventy-five dollars a day. I worked in the theater every night and commuted to Hollywood by taxicab every day, going back the same way, since buses took too long to make the trip. I had to borrow more money, but now, for the first time I knew I could pay it back. Never was a pay-day so long coming. The night I got my first check I could hardly wait to liquidate my debts and count the money I had left.

"I worked on for three weeks, but after the first week I had moved to Hollywood and taxied over to the theater until the play wound up. Columbia wanted me for another picture and after that offered me a contract, but my salary would have begun at seventy-five dollars a week, so I refused. I was right, for in a few days Universal Studios offered me a part and presently I had my contract here, at much more money." (Louise's current picture is "Angela Is Eighteen.")

"When he realized I could get along on my own, I think Father was a little hurt. Then he came out to see me in Hollywood, stayed for a few days and told me: 'You're all right. I can go home in peace.' We looked at one another and beamed. Suddenly we knew how much we loved each other.

"We haven't had a feud since. If ever I have children, I'll follow Father's methods with them. I'll teach them to understand money, but I won't make it too important. I think it's foolish to dwell on mistakes, to keep going over what has been done, worrying: 'Did I spend too much for my coat?', nagging yourself after it's too late to do anything about it.

"For instance, I made some extra money today. Looking through my closet I saw I had too many clothes that weren't being worn. I marked them 'White elephant—what do you offer?' or 'I'd like ten dollars for this—what am I bid?' and hung them in the utility room of the Studio Club, where I live. A few hours later they were all gone. That kind of thrift is a thing I finally, unconsciously, learned from Dad, I'm sure."

Louise lives on a very strict budget still, in spite of her excellent contract. At the Studio Club, she pays fourteen dollars a week for board and room. She allows herself fifteen dollars a week for other expenses, out of which she buys studio lunches, incidentals, and pays for garage and car expenses — everything except clothes.

"I break my budget down to so much a day. If on any certain day I've exhausted my allowance, yet happen to need a new toothbrush or a box of powder, I wait until tomorrow to buy it. I never take a taxicab. If my car is laid up, I ride street cars or buses.

"Sometimes I have money left at the end of a week; when this happens, I put it into my war bond bank. Of course I have my regular investment in war bonds; this is extra and goes into my little glass bank that holds enough to buy a hundred dollar bond. As I fill a glass bank, I take it to my own bank, they break it, give me a bond and a new bank, and I'm ready to go again."

Louise buys her clothes from another fund, but she keeps that down to a carefully budgeted amount each month. She never pays her bills helter skelter so that she loses track of what she's spending, but sits down at her desk the first day of each month and pays everything.

Naturally, if a friend were in trouble and needed funds, Louise would forget her budgets and help. "But the call must be for a real emergency," declared Louise. "I wouldn't help anyone if all she wanted was money for taxicab fare or a new dress. I do without those things myself."

THIS blonde lovely, who plays heroine to Diana Barrymore's heavy in "Fired Wife," intends to leave the screen if and when she marries.

"If I should marry during the war," she qualified her promise, "I'd continue my career while my husband was away saving our country, so as to keep myself occupied, but when he came home, I'd retire and devote myself to managing his home. I'm glad I know how to do that. I'll run the house on a budget according to my husband's income and the way he likes to live."

All this budgeting of finances isn't merely to show herself that she can live economically, however. Louise is steadily building up funds to invest in real estate.

"Father made his money in real estate, and I've watched him," she says earnestly. "He has bought property for me in Texas, and explained to me why the land was a good investment, but that was his affair. I want to understand property values and the secrets of their rise and fall, know when to buy and when to sell. I find this absorbingly interesting.

"Who knows? Perhaps after I'm married and have forgotten the screen, I'll put in my spare time playing the real estate market!"

The Army"' among other hit pictures) and who is now turned writer-producer; Toumanova, who is flawlessly beautiful, and Gregory Peck. After lunch, they took me to see the film's first love scenes.

They are not cute love scenes. Nobody meets anybody in the middle of a lake or on top of a tree, or any of those other goofy places where love scenes all seem to take place in movies now. These are sincere, serious, deeply believed in, deeply experienced love scenes. Toumanova is exquisite in them, but you cannot take your eyes away from Peck.

Robinson shares his contract with David Selznick, and Peck, who only a little while ago was acting as a Radio City guide in New York, has the five best roles in Hollywood lined up before him, among them that great part of Father Chishold in "The Keys of the Kingdom."

It's discoveries like this, it's producers like Robinson coming up that make Hollywood, even in wartime, such a continually exciting place. It makes you want to laugh out loud at all the silly snobs who still believe all Hollywood producers are ex-pants pressers.

Though just what's wrong, in a democracy, with being an ex-pants presser I've never been able to figure, either.

Letter to a P.O.W.

WILL YOU WRITE a letter to a Prisoner of War . . . tonight?

Perhaps he was left behind when Bataan fell. Perhaps he had to bail out over Germany. Anyway, he's an American, and he hasn't had a letter in a long, long time.

And when you sit down to write, tell him why you didn't buy your share of War Bonds last pay day—if you didn't.

"Dear Joe," you might say, "the old topcoat was getting kind of threadbare, so I . . ."

No, cross it out. Joe might not understand about the topcoat, especially if he's shivering in a damp Japanese cell.

Let's try again. "Dear Joe, I've been working pretty hard and haven't had a vacation in over a year, so . . ."

Better cross that out, too. They don't ever get vacations where Joe's staying.

Well, what are you waiting for? Go ahead, write the letter to Joe. Try to write it, anyhow.

But mister, or madam, or miss, if somehow you find you can't finish that letter, will you, at least, do this for Joe? Will you up the amount of money you're putting into your Payroll Savings Plan—so that you'll be buying your share of War Bonds from here on in? And will you—for Joe's sake—start doing it right away?

WAS IT A BOY?

By the time you read this, the happy event will have taken place, but at our most deluxe restaurant, Romanoff's, I ran into that always-superb actor, Robert Young, the day before his newest baby was due to be born. Bob was hoping for a boy, not only because he already has two daughters, but for a reason that only an acting papa would be concerned about.

"My daughters are so emotional," Bob said, giving out with that typical Young grin. "They always want to see my pictures, but I never dare go with them on such occasions, because they respond so to the action. They're Bernhardts. If I get punched, they cry. When I fall down, they howl with delighted glee. The noise they make wouldn't be so bad if they didn't keep informing the audience all around them that 'Daddy's hurt,' or 'Daddy's broken his leg. Goody, goody.'

"I've never once had a compliment from them until 'Sweet Rosie O'Grady.' They actually came home and told me they like me in that one. But I hope you understand why now I yearn for a nice, unemotional son."

AND ANOTHER BABY COMES

Bob went on to tell me about Gene Kelly on the day his baby was born. Gene was working, but he had arranged with the prop men, the electricians, and the script girl to signal him if they heard the director getting any sort of a phone call regarding his blessed event.

Right in the middle of a dance number he looked up to see an electrician giving him the high sign.

"Gene didn't even stop to put his foot down," Bob said. "He ran straight off the set, right off the lot, leaving the camera grinding and the lights blazing. Nobody at the studio saw him again for two days."

Two of the most recent voyagers back from the war zones discuss the headlines—Ann Dvorak and Bob Hope. Read about Ann on page 12.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS OF THE STARS

Christmas, Tyrone asked me to see his lawyer about several pieces of business. The lawyer kept me about four hours, going over and over papers that seemed quite simple. When I reached home, Tyrone said he'd sent a few of the upholstered pieces to be cleaned but that they'd be home in time for our Christmas Eve party.

"They didn't come home. But we gave our dinner, anyway, deciding to use a sitting room upstairs, instead. To my surprise, when we rose from the table, Tyrone said, 'Take the girls upstairs. We'll join you later. We want to try out some tricks.' I supposed that meant 'magic,' in which some of our guests were interested. But when we heard a great deal of noise going on downstairs we said to each other, 'The boys are getting childish, aren't they? Sounds like hopscotch.'

"After forty-five minutes, Tyrone called, 'Come on down, girls!'

"The living room had been entirely redecorated, the pieces sent to be 'cleaned' recovered with fabrics too lovely for words, new pictures hung, everything chosen according to my special taste. Tyrone had given his daily lunch hour for months finding exactly the right things. The trip to the lawyer was arranged so that the decorator could measure everything and decide where to place it. Our male guests helped clear out the old and bring in the new from a truck parked nearby. That was my best gift. Even Tyrone can't top that!"

An electric razor symbolizes the finest Christmas for Helmut Dantine. In Austria it seems they are still shaving with knives, and Helmut had never seen an electric razor until he opened the gift from his uncle on December 25, 1938. He was so excited that he shaved off one eyebrow!

It wasn't really the razor that was wonderful. When the Nazis invaded Austria in the spring of 1938, they threw Helmut into a concentration camp for three months. Then he was given his choice of becoming a Nazi or leaving the country. Thankfully he left, taking his mother, and sailed for America. He was blissfully ordering apple pie and cheese at New York drugstore counters, a pastime that never palled, when his uncle, who lived in Los Angeles, wired him to come out for Christmas.

Christmas day the two arrived to find no snow and plenty of green grass on which people were actually walking, a thing forbidden in Austria.

"I think of my Christmas gift as an electric razor," he said softly, "but it was really freedom."

Michael O'Shea was seven when he received the ultimate in Christmas gifts. His mother was so ill that he had been sent to his grandmother's for the holidays. It was his first journey alone, his first train ride. And although the distance was only forty miles, Michael felt like a well-traveled man when he stepped off at the station. Then came his first sleigh ride to the old fashioned early American home where grandma was trimming a huge tree. Nothing had impressed him so much before—and little has done so since—as the full moon shining on the snow, the jingling bells on the sleigh, the oil lamps and open fire in the house, the air of happy adventure.

Christmas morning brought a note from his mother that she was better and he must enjoy his holiday. That note was the cue to the most wonderful time he ever had.

There are sentimental gifts. There is the golden disc with a cross on one side and on the other: "We will always be together. I love you. Bill", cherished by Michele Morgan; the gold bracelet hung with hearts given Virginia O'Brien in 1941 by the man she later married, Kirk Alyn; and Ida Lupino's very first diamond bracelet, presented by husband Louis Hayward three years ago.

Loretta Young's most treasured gift came last year from small daughter Judy, who embroidered a pillow-case herself. "It's an example of blood, sweat and tears," says Loretta. "She pricked her little fingers, shed perspiration over its complicated pattern. I'll always love it."

When Donald O'Connor was nine,

HEY, WHAT DO YOU THINK OF THIS?

Betty Grable James is knitting! One of the most naturally undomestic girls in town is now running her honeymoon house like clockwork and gathering together baby things at the same time. With government shortages in baby dresses, and other more intimate baby things, ingenious Betty is really creating. Her baby will not lack from knitted sweaters, sacques, bootees and little embroidered dresses. Whenever Betty couldn't get materials or yarn to suit her fancy for her baby she ripped up her own soft handknit sweaters or cut her nightgowns and undies, and the James baby will come into the world looking as glamorous as Rosie O'Grady herself.

he lived with his family in Hartford, Connecticut, and dreamed of owning a bicycle. There was a model in a shop window, chromium trimmed, with siren, rack and all the gadgets. He mentioned it to his mother, hopefully.

"But we haven't the money, Don. We'd like to get it for you, but things are so high this year. You understand, don't you?"

Donald understood, but he continued to press his nose against the shop window to admire his treasure. Up to Christmas Eve he worried lest someone else buy it. But there it stood, beautiful and desirable, when he took his last long look. "Goodbye, bike," he said, trying to be casual.

Christmas morning, under the tree, there it was! Donald saw nothing else. He could hardly breathe. "Hello, bike!" he whispered at last.

Little boys predominated in the neighborhood when Jeanette MacDonald was growing up and their toys seemed much more fascinating than the dolls for little girls. She kept telling her family that she wanted an electric train, and they kept telling her that trains were for little boys. Jeanette was in ecstasy when she found the train, complete with switches and tunnel, on Christmas day.

But I think about the nicest gift of all was Joan Crawford's.

Last Christmas, Christmas of 1942, brought Joan Crawford her finest gift. And behind it lies a story of love and of poignance. You would have to understand, first of all, that with Joan Christmas is a day of vast proportions. Her Christmas list numbers into the hundreds and she personally selects, buys and wraps every present she gives. In return, she herself receives hundreds of gifts, from other stars, from movie executives, from her family and her friends, and scores and scores of them from devoted fans, some of whom she has corresponded with since she first came to stardom.

The Christmas of 1941 was the only time Joan had ever known unhappiness on this festive day. For in Christmas of 1941, Christopher, her adopted son, went back to his mother.

Motherhood touches the deepest emotions of Joan's turbulent heart. Her tender care of young Christina is pointed out in Hollywood circles as the most perfect upbringing of any foster child in the movie colony. Christopher, the little boy, was to have been a companion child to Christina.

Joan had been visiting in New York during the Christmas holidays of 1942 and she returned to her lovely Brentwood home depressed and lonely. She tried to turn all her great capacity of love on Christina and find her happiness there. But she knew, much as she adored the little girl, that this love wasn't quite enough. She knew it was wrong for the child to grow up all alone. She was afraid as an only child, she would develop very selfish traits.

Early in January, she re-met Philip Terry. They had been casually introduced several months before, but it wasn't until 1942 that they ever had a date together.

You know what happened. They were married in July. And now, a year and a half later, they are just

The millionth soldier to visit the Hollywood Canteen was a wonderful smiling Texan, Top Sgt. Carl Bell. (Groaned all the khaki and blue around the place, "Wouldn't you know it would be a Sergeant?")

Sgt. Bell was photographed with Marlene Dietrich, Lana Turner, Deanna Durbin and gifted by everyone in Hollywood. He lived in fairyland for two days while Hollywood made over him as a symbol of every fighting man on all our war fronts. His big blue eyes were popping all the time.

It took thoughtful Deanna to top the whole wonderful time. Her gifts to the service man were presents for his wife and two babies, for he is a happily married man, missing the family that can't be with him. Deanna helped him select appropriate gifts for his family and mailed them herself after he had returned to camp. Sgt. Bell will remember Hollywood, and rightly.

eighteen months happier than they were on their blissful wedding day.

Safe in this romantic and devoted atmosphere, Joan's Christmas of 1942 should have been a happy one, under those circumstances anyway. But the climax of it was that on that day, just one year from the time she had lost Christopher, she got baby Philip Terry II to replace his image in her heart. As one who has been privileged to visit Philip Terry II, let me here go on record as saying he is the most exuberant, handsome and bouncing child to be found in a dozen states.

But it remained for Christina to remove from her mother's mind the last lingering sad memory of the first little boy.

Christina got a party invitation the other day from Christopher Mankowitz, producer Joe Mankowitz's son. The invitation being from child to child, it was merely signed "Christopher" and Joan wanted to be sure whose Christopher was writing.

"Who is Christopher?" Joan asked her daughter.

"Oh, Christopher is my brother," replied Christina airily. "He's away." She paused. She thought. "He's in the army," she added firmly.

The vision of two-year-old Christopher togged out in a G. I. haircut and O.D. boots set Joan to laughing. And as she laughed, she knew, at long last, she could think of Christopher without hurt, that Philip II had replaced his image in her heart.

And that, also, is how she happened to tell this story.

The End

SONJA HENIE—AMERICAN WIFE

camera rolling, and Sonja came in under the light and went into her camel-spin, on one foot, so fast you couldn't see her face, while a thick white fog fell down on her. Suddenly there was a choking sound and a general commotion. Mother Henie cried, "Did she faint?" And two men on skates rushed into the clouds to get Sonja. She came out, a little dizzy but on her own feet. They hadn't told her that the clouds would go over her head; the dry-ice fog had made her close her eyes, instinctively, and she got dizzy. "As long as I keep my eyes open, no spin would make me dizzy," she said. She looked at the camera crew and smiled and said, "Well, let's do it again."

"Aren't you afraid?" I asked her.

She shrugged. "That wouldn't help me." She gave us her gorgeous dimpled smile, casually did an Axel Paulsen (a one-and-a-half jump, ending on the other skate) that made your blood run in reverse and would have been worth a four-forty admission to Madison Square Garden, and was ready for the camera.

That's Henie, Energy & Fearlessness, Inc. She isn't afraid of anything (except mice). She knows that her profession is very dangerous, that she might get killed or—even worse for her—gravely hurt. But she doesn't think of it, because that "wouldn't help her." She has taken a few bad falls which might have killed a less experienced skater. The ice must be kept meticulously clean, no member of her troupe may wear hairpins, and before going on the ice, she inspects her costume with the same care as a trapeze artist. In "Happy Landing" she tripped over the edge of the rink, fell, and got a slight brain concussion.

She is just as fearless and energetic in her business transactions. She makes up her mind quickly and sticks to her decisions. For example: She arrived in America in 1939 on the last trip the "Normandie" ever made. She worried about her brother, Leif, who stayed back in Oslo, carrying on the family's extensive fur business. She decided that he must come over at once, called him on the transatlantic 'phone and told him to "sell the business, bring all the silver and come to America." Nothing could swerve her from that decision. Leif delayed and delayed, but finally he sailed on the last boat from Oslo, on April third—six days before the occupation. He brought all Sonja's trophies, cups, chests of silver. They must be worth over a hundred thousand dollars. Her good judgment had saved her that fortune.

At best, when it comes to her own business, her ability is as spectacular as her skating.

Almost all the great athletes, from Eleanor Holm to Max Baer, have tried movies. With the partial exception of "Tarzan" Weissmuller, they all failed—all but Henie, whose understanding both of business and sports has in addition an uncanny flair for showmanship. She proved it as early as 1927 in Oslo, when she for the first time tried for the world's figure skating championship. After her six rivals had appeared before the judges, dressed quietly, displaying excellent technique, Sonja Henie came out, dressed in a dazzling white silk and ermine costume. She dramatized every figure, put grace into her routine, "dancing on skates." The judges noted her beautiful slim body; they couldn't help observing her cute white underthings. This was beauty, sex appeal, and marvelous technique as well. Naturally, she won.

She has worked hard, earning every ounce of success. She spent ten years, practicing seven hours daily, until she was perfect. She doesn't smoke or drink, sleeps ten hours, eats whatever she likes, preferably Chinese food and ice cream, is always in condition. When they told her she weighed too much (one hundred and thirty pounds), she went down to one hundred and eight. Just like that. There is no strain on her; she's always relaxed. Her legs don't show any muscles, are as slim and shapely —(Grable fans, please don't listen)— as Betty's. Sonja's legs are insured for five thousand dollars a year, the largest sum Lloyds of London would underwrite. She is a champion swimmer, plays hockey, won eighteen skiing championships, three Scandinavian tennis titles. She was chosen by her countrymen as the outstanding living Norwegian, and King Haakon telegraphs her luck before each performance. Among her famous fans of her amateur skating were Queen Mary of England, King Gustav V of Sweden, Adolf Hitler, Benito Mussolini. But she is much prouder of the fact that in 1939 she was the third-ranking box office star, topped only by Shirley Temple and Clark Gable. The fact is that she likes movies more than anything else.

Her romance with Dan Topping starting in 1940, made every American newspaper headline. Tinplate heir and Queen of the Ice! It was a ready-made columnist's dream. It was even better than the previous Tyrone Power-Sonja Henie romance which had a light taste of studio publicity.

But since their marriage on July 4th, 1940, Dan and Sonja have become the worst possible copy for the columnists. The eternal bliss of romance hovers over their marriage. They are happy, and happy people don't make the headlines. They have built a beautiful beach home on Long Island, but haven't been there since Dan went into the Marines.

Sonja's rented house in Beverly Hills is a medium sized, modern affair with large windows and lots of partitions and sunshine flowing through all rooms. Sonja loves the California sunshine and can't get enough of it. Sometimes she goes down to Laguna Beach where she is nearer to Dan, who is now stationed in the vicinity. Knowing the value of time Sonja wants to spend most of it with her husband.

Children? "Sure. Later." That's all she will say—Viking girls are not given to discuss their innermost emotions. And being a cosmopolite, having always travelled around the world, Sonja never thinks of the difference in nationalities between her and Dan.

"He is gentle, gallant, and kind-hearted," she explains. "There are nice men in Norway and perhaps everywhere, and Dan is the nicest. It doesn't make any difference what language a man speaks, if you like him."

Independently wealthy, Dan's flair for big business makes him a good mate for Sonja. He used to manage the Dodgers, ran an advertising agency, in addition to handling vast investment transactions. After the war, he will probably return to all that.

Today Sonja does not manage these businesses of her husband, as has sometimes been told, but she stages all the numbers for her famous ballet on ice, thinks up the dancing routines, hires the skaters, studies wardrobe sketches and music — with a company of over a hundred people and weekly expenses running around fifty thousand dollars. This fall she plans to have the show on tour in fewer cities for longer engagements, because of transportation difficulties. Her New York hit, "Stars on Ice," which she owns and co-produces, was the only show making money in the giant Center Theatre. She has her sports clothes business. She introduces her own designs in her shows, did her own modeling. She has her vast array of Henie skates, Henie toys, Henie dolls, and Henie what-not, which earn for her another fifty thousand a year. She doesn't conceal that she likes to make big money, but her hairdressers, costume women, and other studio workers tell you that she loves to spend it on the people she works with. For instance, she gave her wardrobe girl a diamond brooch and a diamond bracelet recently, and she buys expensive gifts for people who can't afford them.

She isn't one of the most popular people in Hollywood. She doesn't like Hollywood's way of showing off, and Hollywood doesn't like her self-possessed attitude. "She doesn't act like a movie celebrity but like a celebrity in-the-movies," someone said. Sonja doesn't care. She has her husband and her mother—who is always with Sonja, her most competent critic and adviser—and her youth and her success. This winter she made personal appearances in Army camps, particularly in the "little Norway" soldiers camps in Canada.

Norway's five-foot-two honey blonde beauty has done herself proud. After seven years in pictures, she is still one of Hollywood's great box office stars; after twenty years in sports, she is still the unsurpassed Ice Queen. Her story is so fantastic that it has to be true to be believed. But it is all true and all self-created.

Little Sonja Henie, Career Glamour Girl par excellence, is still One In A Million.

SUSAN PETERS PLANS HER MARRIAGE

nails; I'm meticulous. But where a household comes in, I go out! Dick is the one who labels his beloved collection of records and has a fit of temper if they're mixed up. Dick's the one who notices that the drapes are disarranged, or the copper lamps we picked up at an auction unpolished, or that the living room table is littered with my scissors and needle. I don't even see those things until Dick's at work straightening them out. So I know I'll never be ashamed of the looks of our house, thanks to him.

And will we have children! Fifteen of 'em doesn't seem too many to either of us, though of course we'll be limited to the number we feel we can support in comfort. We know just how we'll bring them up, too. No baby-talk, and we'll love 'em when they're nice, and spank 'em when they're bad. Also, we'll always tell them the truth whenever they ask questions. Never a lie, not for anything; though of course we'll limit our answers to the scope of their understanding. And as the child grows older, the answers will grow more complete.

But apart from trying to keep our children honestly informed and well behaved, they're on their own. Dick and I won't force them into college if they're not interested—after all, their mother's education came to a full stop after high school. Nor will we care how they earn their livings as adults. If they want to be garbage collectors, that'll be all right with us—so long as they're the best garbage collectors in town.

Our California home will be a permanent one, too. We'll never go to Broadway to do a show. We both love to act in movies (though we actually don't like seeing them!), and if by any chance my career should come to a stand-still, I'll still be anchored in California as a secretary. I'm taking typing and shorthand right now, at night school, just in case. Because I've seen too many careers stopped by some automobile accident or other quirk of fate not to want to be prepared for an emergency.

But none of this is telling you our real worth to each other—as emotional stabilizers, each to the other. Take Dick's jealousy, for example, which is his one fault, and a rapidly disappearing one. I can't understand or abide jealousy, which I feel is rank stupidity. But a year ago, Dick was wallowing in it—perhaps because he knew I'd been engaged several times before, and perhaps because we ourselves weren't officially engaged then. Now that he's more sure of me, his jealousy is evaporating like a fine mist. So I foresee no jealousy in our married life, on either side.

I also foresee none of my dreadful Irish rages, which have been disappearing like Dick's jealousy in the past few months. There was a time, lasting twenty-one years to be exact, when I'd fly into a shrieking, sobbing rage at the drop of an imagined insult. Now I don't any more. At least not when Dick's around. Because he either backs me into a corner and talks fast and logically until I've seen the error of my ways, or else he just laughs at me. And you can't stay mad when you're being laughed at. Right in the middle of a tantrum, with tears pouring down my face, I'll break up into laughter, because he is—and there's the end of my temper! So. No tempests in the Quine household. Of that I'm positive.

You may be surprised, if you drop in at our home, to see us handling our Mood Problem, which we solved many months ago in Mother's and my apartment. You see, we both have black moods; often daily, after we come back from the studio. We know just how to deal with them now. Dick takes one chair and stares blindly and silently into space for two or three hours, while I sit across the room in another chair doing exactly the same thing. There we sit, like two bumps on a log, in a room so silent you could hear a pin drop. And then, when we're both over our moods, we're just the same as always—gay, talkative, happy. So we'll never misunderstand each other on that matter. Not ever.

Another thing. We'll both always be trying to think of the other's wishes. I never did that, until I met Dick—I was thoughtless and forgetful, both of other people and myself. People probably thought I was Scotch because I always forgot to bring money with me; and Mother thought me selfish because I never remembered her birthday—much less my own! Dick's changed all that by his own niceness, which I find myself trying to copy. Every time he came to dinner (which was every night), he brought some thoughtful gift to Mother and me—flowers, ear-rings, books, records. Now that he's in the Coast Guard, stationed at Alameda near San Francisco, he calls us every night without fail; and several times a week the Railroad Express delivers us a box of precious candy from him. He'll continue that when we're married, I know. And I'll find myself trying to do the same.

Of course, we both have some minor conflicts that time will never change, which we'll just have to put up with. Like Dick's love of good food, and my mild flirtation with it. I'm never hungry, and meals just bore me. But once we're running our own house I'll cater to his food tastes—even if it means serving ice cream (his favorite food) for breakfast every day! Then there's our clothes conflict. Dick enjoys dressing up in white tie and tails, while I don't own a dress longer than my knees. I can't abide formal clothes; my closet has nothing hanging in it but slacks, shorts, and spectator sports dresses. But I'll have to stock up on a couple of formals—which I'll ask Dick to help me pick out, just as he's helped me choose all my wardrobe in the past year. His taste is excellent; just as good for my things as for his own, and Dick dresses beautifully.

Frances Langford carried out a "command" given her by Lieut. General George S. Patton, Jr., commander of the American 7th Army when she brought first-hand news of her famous brother to Miss Anne W. Patton of San Marino. Among other things, Frances said that "Old Blood and Guts" reserves his thirty-third degree toughness for his military life. In private life he's warm and human and just as boyishly enthusiastic about souvenir hunting as any buck private you can find.

And I hope he'll be able to change my fear of public appearances, both at parties and on the stage. I always suffer from a paroxysm of shyness, and I've never yet made a speech without fainting later, back-stage! Dick, of course, can hardly understand this, since he's been a dancer, singer, and actor in endless Broadway shows; while I popped right out of Hollywood High School into the movies. But he's working on it, and I believe in him enough to know he'll succeed in giving me courage for people and microphones. He's succeeded in everything else, after all!

And that's about it. We're two people who have already adjusted our personalities, and discovered we had the same attitude on life and on living. I hate smutty jokes almost as much as Dick does; and I love a clean, quiet, outdoor life just exactly as much as he does. We don't have Cupid to thank for this ideal marriage, either—we have my mother, who first saw how perfectly suited we were, and now (I sometimes think) likes Dick even better than she likes me! She'll be there to watch us get married in a double-ring ceremony, and she'll write to us when, some day after the war, we'll travel all over the world. Because that's something else we have in common: love of traveling.

But most of all, we love each other—completely, and excluding all else. You see now, don't you? And you'll wish us the best of everything, won't you? Because whether you do or not, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Quine simply cannot fail!

GARY COOPER EXPLAINS HIMSELF

autograph books and like it. But if my wife and I get hungry for good music or a current show, we can sneak into a big concert hall or movie house where no one is expecting us. At least this works with me. I'm not the matinee idol type.

However, I believe it's important for people in this business to try to live a normal life as near to their fellow Americans' lives as they can get, if they hope to interpret life as it is.

I GET A BOOT:

Out of tough locations—two years later. Spectacular fires, sandstorms on the desert, swollen rivers on the rampage are nothing to look forward to when you have some tricky scenes to make, but if you come through okay they're fun—looking back.

I BELIEVE:

Luck has something to do with success. You're there at the right moment; you see the right man, say the right thing, and get a break.

You can't leave it all to luck. You must figure all the angles, try one of them after another, not stop to worry. Finally something ought to work.

I'VE FOUND OUT:

A lot of interesting things from watching studio experts on pictures. They can lay out fire trains for spectacular blazes so that flames travel just where they send them. They can break up dams and know exactly how far the waters will go, how fierce they'll look and where scenes should be shot.

IF I COULD:

Relive one day in my life, I wouldn't pick out a day when I was very happy or things were going well. The greatest joys in life are always in the future. I'd like to live over a day when I made my worst blunders and see whether I could make them come out right.

I REGRET:

Not going to Warsaw on my last European trip. We had our tickets and were on our way but detoured back to Paris for some reason and hadn't the time later. Now the Warsaw that was is no more.

Not being able to do some scenes over once I see my picture in preview.

I KNOW:

Every city has its own personality, just as people are all individuals. I liked London and Paris and most of the European cities I visited before the war, and I wish I could see them once again as they were at that time.

That for all time living, Los Angeles has everything. We have the city, and everything else is close at hand. My wife loves to ski, and we can reach the snow in an hour and forty-five minutes from our house. I like to hunt and fish—I can be in the mountains or beside deep lakes in a few hours. In peacetime, that is.

I thoroughly enjoyed going on safari in Africa years ago, but I remember it took us three days to reach a mountain that looked as if it was right over there when we started out. That's fun once. For all the time, give me the U.S.A.

I'M CONVINCED:

You can't do anything unless you're sincere about it. You have to believe in it or nobody else will. Sergeant York, whom I met only once, was like that. And Dr. Wassell is like that, too.

THE REASON:

People think I'm like the men I impersonate on the screen is that I'm nearly always cast in American roles. We like to think of Americans as people who do pretty much as they please, are intensely individualistic, have practically all the virtues we admire, but don't wear them on parade.

PERSONALLY:

I'm not like any of the men I play. I'm just the guy who shows through the seams of the characters on the screen, minus the virtues and plus a lot of human faults.

I'D LIKE TO:

Come back in a hundred years and see what's happened. But what happens here in the next twenty-five years is what is really vital to me. I hope and expect we'll find a way to end wars.

It's interesting to read forecasts of what marvels we'll have in the future—how we'll fly our own little helicopters and live in houses that are fireproof, termite proof, earthquake proof, and all but trouble proof, and eat food that will keep us too healthy ever to die. But—

I THINK AMERICANS:

Should remember we are a new people—we have a terrific advantage over all other peoples because of our great heritage, and it's up to us to use widely this advantage for the benefit of all.

Every one of us should see to it that we don't lose what we have, that we cling to the ideal of America and not let ourselves and the rest of the world down.

We're a mixed race—we come from all races—and we have a great and precious gift to guard, forever!

MOVIELAND'S BEAUTY PARLOR

a facial, minus massage.

She uses mint for vitamin-packed tea; a brew made with thyme for an eyewash.

Before the butter shortage, she used natural cream as a lubricant and hand-lotion.

And, when eggs are plentiful, she uses the old-fashioned egg rinse on her hair for scalp conditioning and those beautiful, glowing highlights.

Which all goes to show that you needn't be a city slicker to be beautiful!

BEAUTY CHATTER:

Most chatter is listed under "Sense and Nonsense." Most of ours, we think, stays under just "Sense"—good, plain and common, and all directed at beauty and well-being.

Making sense, Alice Faye says she smooths a dot of rouge on the lobes of her ears when wearing earrings, particularly pearls or diamonds. She says it's flattering—and she's right! . . . Alice comes up with another hint, this time anent the bath. As an alternate for the tepid or warm bath that relieves fatigue, Alice stands under the shower with the hot spray hitting the center of the back of her neck and shoulders, then steps out and sprays her neck and shoulders with her favorite cologne. This, coupled with ten minutes' rest, prone, is wonderful for relaxation . . . You've heard us mention almond meal before? Well, here's a tip from Lynn Bari, who uses a favorite facial shampoo. She makes a rich lather of good, mild soap with her hands, and mixes it with a teaspoonful of almond meal. Lynn rubs the soap lather and meal onto her face, allowing it to remain for five minutes, and rinses it off in tepid water. The finishing touch is a dash of ice water. It's a quick and sure way to a wonderfully glowing skin! . . . Ever wiggle your scalp to cure a mild, nervous headache? Believe it or not, that's Olivia de Havilland's cure. Coming from the gentle Olivia, it must have its virtues. She says, "If you can't wiggle your scalp by wrinkling your forehead or opening your mouth, then give it a superficial wiggle with the tips of your fingers." . . . In a bad mood? "Sing any song that comes into your mind," advises Irene Manning, Warner Bros. star. "You'll dissipate your anger and bad feelings from sheer concentration on the tune and the lyrics." And, remember, anger is harmful to beauty—and you don't have to be able to sing like Irene! . . . Back to Lynn Bari again, and a query as to the kind of eyebrow you're lifting. Lynn has beautiful, shining eyebrows. Seems her secret is to massage them with a good oil, using the tips of her fingers and deep massage to bring up circulation. She removes the oil with a damp cloth, and sets the shape of her brows with an eyebrow brush . . .

And so, until next month—

LISTEN TO THIS!

Two great hulking men bending over the glass section.

"See the beautiful Sandwich glass vase," said one. "Golly, look at this Crown Derby cream pitcher."

Hovering in the background is the owner of the shop, watching two of his best customers. Fred MacMurray and Lloyd Nolan, buying surprises for their wives. Both men have adopted the hobbies of their wives, antiques, and the girls are having a hard time keeping up with them.

Lloyd is an authority on hallmarks and histories of old English glassware, and Fred is a specialist in fruit woods and such.

DAME MAY WHITTY REFLECTS ON MARRIAGE

great American producer, wanted me to come to New York, and I wanted to come, but not so much as I wanted to be with my husband. So we did not come until we arrived together in the Henry Irving company. It was New York where our daughter, Margaret Webster, was born. And I feel it is very charming of fate to have let Margaret's greatest successes happen to her in that same city.

I cannot exaggerate how proud I was when the King included me in his birthday honors in January, 1918, making me a Dame Commander. But I can truthfully say I am even more proud of the fine notices my daughter has won for herself in staging Shakespearean drama in the New York theater. I consider her an exceptionally fine actress, and that is the only regret I have about her—that she prefers being a producer to being an actress. Yet once again my feeling for the freedom of others functions here. If she prefers staging plays to acting in them, then that is up to her and I have no right to interfere.

Side by side, Ben and I have seen the world change drastically. The simplicity and charm of those days before the First World War are gone. The excitement and the depression of the Thirties have also passed. Hitler and his associates will pass, too. This we all know.

But when two people live through such cataclysms in history, they need a firm faith to hold to. Love can be that faith. Love is stronger than death and much stronger than the most arrogant conquest of any dictator.

In fifty-one years of loving, you drop all the dross and emerge only with the qualities that endure because of their very strength and refinement. Ben always gave my love that security on which all the solid things of life are founded.

Since 1936 Ben, Margaret, and I have been in this country. Ben and I love California now, even though our hearts are saddened by the thoughts of war-time England. I have been very fortunate in my film roles, though "Lassie Come Home" is my favorite picture because in that Ben and I were able to play together. Play ourselves, really. Just an elderly couple utterly content with one another's presence.

Yet that latter isn't quite true. We are utterly content, but we are much more than that. After half a century, we are still romantic about one another.

THE END

Ruth Waterbury and Ann Sothern on the set of "Cry Havoc." Ann wasn't in the scene that day but was present to read off-screen lines to little Dorothy Morris. "She's such a good actress," said Ann, who doesn't know the meaning of the word jealousy. She's really one mighty swell gal.

LORETTA YOUNG

MY LANA TURNER By Stephen Crane

"VITAMIN LACK CAN CAUSE HAIR TO TURN GRAY", SAYS MODERN SCIENCE

Can this 2-Way VITAMIN DISCOVERY RESTORE NATURAL COLOR to Your GRAY or GRAYING HAIR?

New Test So Easy...It's Amazing!

If your hair is gray, graying, streaked or off-color due to vitamin deficiency, this test of the original PANATES double-action VITAMIN treatment offers you amazing new hope! You have read about the scientific vitamin tests that, while too recent for conclusive evidence, have shown startling signs of results. It has been proven beyond doubt that a lack of certain vitamins in the daily diet may be a contributing cause for hair to lose its natural color and turn gray. Simply by improving your diet and by taking the harmless, concentrated food vitamins in PANATES each day, you may check the gray spread . . . you may actually see gray, old-looking, streaked, fading hair change back at the roots, temples and parting to normal, original color, natural color! But first let me tell you what the original PANATES double-action vitamin method, is, how PANATES differs so drastically from other anti-gray hair vitamins and why so many of the thousands of women and men who once accepted PANATES on this same trial offer now continue with it because of the amazing change in hair color they testify as taking place before their very eyes!

Panates is NOT A HAIR DYE

Nothing to Fear . . No Mess, No Fuss

Panates supply not only the "anti-gray" hair vitamins, but give you the "staff of life" wheat germ oil (Vitamin E) as well. Absolutely harmless, Panates actually is a healthful food supplement. Panates gives your system a source for the hair color vitamins that may be lacking in your daily diet and, if so, should literally feed natural color into the hair roots to check gray spread, to help the hair to new, lively lustre and to bring new hope for restoration of normal hair color once again.

Panates isn't a hair dye. Panates is the natural way to seek natural hair color. You can test Panates whether you now artificially color your hair or not, because Panates "Anti-Gray" Hair Vitamins with Wheat Germ Oil Vitamin E, feeds your system from within. If you now dye your hair, you may notice you need less and less artificial hair color. If your hair is just starting to turn gray, you may notice the graying process is checked and soon the gray strands may be less and less pronounced. That's one of the wonderful things about the "anti-gray hair" vitamins in Panates . . . the action is natural. No one need know you are doing a single thing for your hair. And ladies, Panates will not hurt or interfere with permanents.

No matter what your normal hair color might be, before graying due to vitamin lack, brown, auburn or blonde, if you see signs of hair color restoration, you will be amazed to note that the new color is the original, normal color of your natural hair.

This Trial Offer Is Fair and It Calls for Immediate Acceptance

Is your gray or graying hair due to deficiency in the very vitamins in Panates? We bring you a very fair money-back coupon offer that certainly makes it easy for you to test Panates treatment yourself to see what Panates two vitamins may do for you in your fight for the happiness of lovely-looking, natural hair color beauty. You take no chances. You can test Panates in the confidence these vitamins are taken daily by countless thousands the nation over. Our money-back guarantee is your protection against loss of a single penny. Now, today, mail the coupon. Who knows . . . perhaps your hair is gray or graying because of vitamin deficiency and perhaps gloriously soon your hair will show first signs of being restored to its original, youthful color. Beauty RESOLUTIONS for 1944

MAYBE you think you've convinced yourself that being beautiful isn't really so important. But it's just "sour grapes," isn't it? Why be discouraged by looking in the mirror at what you ARE? Why not look for the possibilities of what you MIGHT be?

Make that your resolution for the new year: to put your best face forward!

According to makeup artists like Perc Westmore (see him above, preparing Geraldine Fitzgerald to face the cameras at Warner Bros.), beauty is largely a matter of knowing how to apply correctional makeup. Blend makeup with your complexion color. Learn to apply lipstick—take the time to give your mouth a prettier curve; learn to put on rouge to accentuate the contours of your face. Open up the space between your brows by careful plucking; let them contribute to the oval face effect which is more balanced. Be sure, too, that your nails are clean, not too long and evenly coated with becoming polish. Take care of your hair. Don't forget the daily brushing.

Keep these resolutions and we're confident that our wish for a HAPPY NEW YEAR will come true!

A recent portrait of CONSTANCE LUFT HUHN by Maria de Kammerer

DOING DOUBLE DUTY?

I Suggest a Tangee Satin-Finish Lipstick!

—says Constance Luft Huhn, Head of the House of Tangee

If shouldering new wartime duties—in addition to your day-in, day-out activities—has made you long for a lipstick that stays smooth and stays on... I sincerely recommend our new Tangee Satin-Finish Lipsticks.

Here is all you've ever longed for in a lipstick. Glorious color, of course. And, as well, an exquisite grooming... a luxuriously soft and satiny sheen... only possible with Tangee's exclusive Satin-Finish. Not too dry, not too moist—the Tangee Lipstick of your choice will seem to "smooth" itself on to your lips and, once on, stay for hours.

And, to have the utmost confidence in the perfection of your make-up, match your Tangee Satin-Finish Lipstick with its companion rouge—match your complexion with your own shade of Tangee's deceptively UN-powdery Face Powder.

NEW TANGEE MEDIUM-RED... a warm, clear shade. Not too dark, not too light... just right.

TANGEE RED-RED..."Rarest, Loveliest Red of Them All," harmonizes perfectly with all fashion colors.

TANGEE THEATRICAL RED..."The Brilliant Scarlet Lipstick Shade"... Is always most flattering.

TANGEE NATURAL..."Beauty for Duty"—conservative make-up for women in uniform. Orange in the stick, it changes to produce your own most becoming shade of blush rose.

BEAUTY—glory of woman...
LIBERTY—glory of nations...
Protect them both...

The METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

We're talking about "Madame Curie", one of the finer efforts in the annals of motion picture progress.

★ ★ ★ ★

This adventurous romance of the woman whose love and devotion endowed us with the magic of radium is in for a run at the famed Radio City Music Hall.

★ ★ ★ ★

Our office wag wishes to edit this copy to read "Radium" City Music Hall.

★ ★ ★ ★

As a matter of fact Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer—your favorite film company we take it—has a few pictures in the bag which are really going to cause ohs and ahs, pull in the awards, and all that sort of thing.

★ ★ ★ ★

"A Guy Named Joe", "The White Cliffs", "Madame Curie". Three worthy successors to "Mrs. Miniver" and "Random Harvest".

★ ★ ★ ★

As a matter of course, Greer Garson is "Madame Curie". Greer and Walter Pidgeon are the stars.

★ ★ ★ ★

Directed by Mervyn LeRoy and produced by Sidney Franklin, the "Random Harvest" duo, "Madame Curie" can be described in a word of one syllable—great.

★ ★ ★ ★

Its cast, typical of M-G-M, includes ten names additional to Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon—names that could grace any theatre marquee and mean something.

★ ★ ★ ★

They are Henry Travers, Albert Basserman, Robert Walker, C. Aubrey Smith, Dame May Whitty, Victor Francen, Elsa Basserman, Reginald Owen, Van Johnson and Margaret O'Brien.

★ ★ ★ ★

Incidentally the mention of Margaret O'Brien makes us think of another fine M-G-M film "The Lost Angel" which you must not miss.

★ ★ ★ ★

But first comes "Madame Curie" with our favorite screen couple in a screen play by Paul Osborn and Paul H. Rameau based on the book by Eve Curie.

★ ★ ★ ★

Produced with love and attention to detail, with settings that are superbly artistic, a camera that understands, and a story that will keep you enthralled, "Madame Curie" is a real event in the theatre.

★ ★ ★ ★

It is an event that you must usher in.—Leo

TOUJOURS L'AMOUR MATURE

Hollywood really got itself het up over the Anne Shirley-Vic Mature "engagement."

The town felt pretty sorry for this self-styled genius when Rita Hayworth married that greater genius, Orson Welles. It grinned over the fact that Vic carried that torch very visibly, anywhere the press might be present. Since the guy was honestly doing such a fine job with the Coast Guard, they easily forgave his visibly suffering over his battered heart. Vic has always been a hound for publicity anyhow, and has never hidden the fact.

When he came back to movieland on furlough it was all hunky-dory when he took out K. T. Stevens, then Betty Hutton, and then began calling up the other glamour numbers. He even tried to marry one of our leading stars, who merely grinned at his seriousness.

It just got too thick, however, when a couple of nights later he and Anne Shirley announced their intention to wed. Trouble was, Annie is supposed to be most interested in Eddie Albert but only a week previously had had eyes for no one but Edgar Bergen.

When two days after the announced engagement Anne broke it, the storm really hit. Anne has been such a popular kid up until now, but even her closest chums let her know what they thought of such headline antics. Little Jane Wyman, for instance, told Annie off in front of a whole party.

One angle on the whole thing that hasn't been much discussed is that John Payne and Vic used to be the closest friends.

No one knows how John thinks, but everybody's wondering.

(More Inside Hollywood on page 10)

Ann Sheridon is rumored "that way" over this smiling Irishman, Steve Hannagan, the guy who promoted Miami Beach to a big spot on the map. Now he's trying to promote our Annie into matrimony, but she says nope—just as before, when the guy was Errol Flynn.

HOLLYWOOD'S CRADLE ROCKIN' MAMAS

Except for Alice Faye, I have never seen a girl more beautifully changed by maternity than Lana Turner. Lana and Steve have gone through such a lot together, but they seem to have arrived at complete, mutual happiness. When they go nightclubbing, it's plainly just to dance. Steve, having received an honorable medical discharge from the Army, is back in civvies—and on their late dates, he and Lana drink milk and slip home by ten o'clock.

As for Alice Faye, she's in seventh heaven now that she's going to have her second child. Twentieth Century-Fox has temporarily argued her into not leaving the screen, but my own hunch is that she may not stick around too long.

The plaudits of fame don't mean a thing to Alice, as compared to Phil and Alice, Jr., and now the new-expected. She loves the domestic life, has saved her money and plans a really big family. She says when she comes back to the screen she hopes to play straight drama.

"The Gang's All Here" is no great shakes as a musical, but I still hope Alice doesn't stop singing on screen. No one else could have sung "No Love, No Nothin'" quite as she does.

CUPID'S CUTEST TRUE STORIES

Being as how St. Valentine's day is close I thought you might like to hear two cute proposal stories.

Several years ago, a very small girl named Ella Raines entered for the first time the portals of the Snoqualmie Grammar School, in Washington. She was gazing in awe at this institute of learning when a boy in short pants approached her. Kenneth Trout was in the third grade and magnanimously offered to show the newcomer the ropes.

The two kids went through the Snoqualmie Grammar School and the Snoqualmie High School together, their love for each other growing with every promotion to a higher grade.

When the war came, Kenneth Trout enlisted and almost

MOVIELAND'S NEW PICTURE GUIDE

CRY "HAVOC" (MGM) despite its brilliant cast of actresses, is essentially a stage drama lacking in conviction, a piece of war fiction about some thirteen nurses and nursing volunteers who fall prisoners of the Japs on Bataan. Like the play with its all-feminine group of players, the picture is confined for the most part to a dugout where the women were headquartered and where they retired to catch snatches of rest between the bombardments. Somehow they all seem too annoyingly engrossed with personal problems and more concerned with giving individual performances than in performing their brave duties.

Into the dugout melodrama are crammed Margaret Sullavan, a lieutenant of regular Army nurses, Fay Bainter, her captain in command, Ann Sothern, a former hash-slinging waitress, Joan Blondell, an ex-burlesque queen, and a full complement of other types played by Marsha Hunt, Ella Raines, Frances Gifford, Diana Lewis, Heather Angel, Dorothy Morris, Connie Gilchrist, Gloria Grafton and Fely Franquelli. Conversationally they fight a stagey war; the dirt on their faces obviously make up; the soil on their clothing artistically applied. You can skip this and cling to the memories of "So Proudly We Hail," which was much nearer to the truth of what occurred on Bataan. Grim as it was, you really should know.

HIS BUTLER'S SISTER (Universal) marks another step forward for Deanna Durbin as a grown-up romantic star. In a gay come-out-of-the-kitchen comedy, engagingly labeled "a fable of the day before yesterday," she captivates with her singing, but more importantly charms just as the story would have you believe that she does. She is a fresh and irresistible Cinderella who arrives in New York under the impression that her brother is a rich man, only to discover that he is a butler in the Park Avenue penthouse. Franchot Tone is the wealthy man, and Pat O'Brien the butlering brother. Another gentleman's gentleman is amusingly played by Akim Tamiroff, sure-fire in any role he attempts.

THE CROSS OF LORRAINE (MGM) does not spare your feelings in depicting the sadistic cruelties practiced by Nazis in conducting a French prison camp. It is one of the most brutal, bloody and hate-arousing documents yet filmed. While it is undoubtedly true, may be even an under-statement of the horrors inflicted, such a shocker is hard to take under the guise of entertainment.

Part of the power of the picture is sacrificed by the current Hollywood notion that anyone can play a Frenchman if the character is plainly named Gaston or Francois. One real Frenchman, Jean Pierre Aumont, who has an accent, finds himself cast as a countryman of Gene Kelly, Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Hume Cronyn and Richard Whorf. As the cruelest of the German jailers, Peter Lorre has a gloriously gory time.

THE TUNEFILMS:

Well, here I come—on a wing and a brand new year! And from the Hollywood scene this new 1944 looks "solid" with lots of good musicals cooking.

Let's start out with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. First there's "Swing Fever," which stars Kay Kyser and Marilyn Maxwell, the latter a handsome dish. Marilyn was Kay's real life romance for a while and is the same girl who used to sing with Buddy Rogers and Ted Weems under the name of Marvel Maxwell.

Also at M-G-M there's "Broadway Rhythm," a super duper with Tommy Dorsey and his orchestra, George Murphy, Ginny Simms, Lena Horne, Gloria De Haven, Nancy Walker, Hazel Scott, Charles Winninger and Kenny Bowers. The numbers are tops, one of the best being "Brazilian Boogie Woogie" featuring Lena Horne. For my money, Lena is one of the greatest vocal artists in America today. Ginny sings Jerome Kern's immortal "All The Things You Are," and if it hasn't been one of your favorite songs before this, it will be after you hear her do it. Hazel Scott plays Chopin's "Minute Waltz" and "Body and Soul" in her incomparable style, and is one of the standouts of the picture. Gloria De Haven and Kenny Bowers share honors with "What Do You Think I Am?" This is the cute song from the original score of the stage production of "Best Foot Forward" but it was cut out of the movie version of "Best Foot" and put into this film. The things that go on in Hollywood!

"Meet The People" is another flicker you won't want to miss. Besides Lucille Ball and Dick Powell, it contains such rhythmic personalities as The King Sisters, Virginia O'Brien, Vaughn Monroe and his orchestra, with his soloists Ziggy Talent and The Murphy Sisters, and Spike Jones and the City Slickers. Ziggy does his hysterical rendition of "I Can't Dance" and Spike makes with the cowbells, washboards, etc., to do "Schicklegruber." Virginia O'Brien sings Rogers' and Hart's "I'd Like To Recognize The Tune" in her deadpan style. And there's a swell finale number, "It's Smart To Be People." Listen particularly for the fine vocal arrangements. . . .

Harriet Hilliard, The Andrews Sisters and Mitch Ayres and his band get the top billing in Universal's "Swingtime Johnny." The girls do two numbers which you've probably heard them do on the air, "Boogie Woogie Choo Choo" and "You'd Better Give Me Lots Of Lovin', Honey," and Harriet sings a jive version of "Sweet and Low." . . .

Donald O'Connor's newest is "This Is The Life" with his old girl friend, Peggy Ryan, and a new one for him, Suzanna Foster. You Ray Eberle fans will enjoy his singing of "All Or Nothing At All." Universal has just started preparation on an all-star musical, "Three Cheers For The Boys," which won't be out for months, but I thought you'd like to know about it anyway. Get a load of this line-up: Charlie Spivak, Ted Lewis, Freddy Slack, Dinah Shore, Jeanette MacDonald, Sophie Tucker and The Andrews Sisters. . . .

It's Kay Kyser again, but this time under the R.K.O. banner, in "Around The World," the story of his amazing camp show tours, including some imaginary ones to Casablanca, Egypt and other locales.

And say, speaking of R.K.O. reminds me that they have big things in mind for the Sinatra lad if Uncle Sam doesn't get him first. They gave him a seven-year contract and his next picture is "Mr. Cinderella." I hope they don't change the name because that title really fits Frank. . . .

WHAT'S BRISK ON THE DISC:

The Decca and Capitol recording studios have been the "jumpinest" spots in town, what with all the pressing going on. We'll take Decca first. Bing Crosby got into the yuletide spirit and made "I'll Be Home For Christmas" with John Scott Trotter's orchestra and then joined with the Sisters Andrews for "Jingle Bells" and "Santa Claus Is Coming To Town," but they're so good you'll want to play them all year round. Jimmy Dorsey and the band recorded "Star Eyes" with Bob Eberly and Kitty Kallen doing one of their double vocals and "They're Either Too Young Or Too Old" with Kitty soloing it. Jimmy's band is one of my favorites and I was fortunate in being at the studio the night they made this platter. What a perfectionist he is! He'll do a thing over and over until it's just the way he wants it.

On the serious side, Victor Young has made an album of his brilliant score from "For Whom The Bell Tolls." . . . The Capitol people have been busy little bees, too. They signed Stan Kenton to an exclusive recording contract and his first disc is "Do Nothing Till You Hear From Me," featuring Dolly Mitchell and "Eager Beaver," an instrumental. Johnny Mercer does "G.I. Jive" and "I'm Gonna Sit Right Down and Write Myself A Letter" with Paul Weston's orchestra. Johnny wrote words and music for "Jive," and it has a very cute lyric. I heard him do it at the Hollywood Canteen the other night and it nearly broke up the party. Capitol's Number One girl, Ella Mae Morse, has made a killer record in "Shoo Shoo, Baby" and "No Love, No Nothin'." The latter tune is the same one Alice Faye introduced in "The Gang's All Here." Ella Mae's orchestral accompaniment is provided by her husband, Dick Walters. She also does "Boogie Blues" and "Tess' Torch Song." And the last one, and possibly the best, is Benny Carter's "Poinciana" and "Hurry, Hurry." Carter plays a sensational alto solo on "Poinciana" and Savannah Churchill's vocal on "Hurry" is nothing short of wonderful. By the way, this disc was recorded in San Francisco and is the first commercial record ever made in the bay city . . . Columbia has a lone issue this month, but it's one that you'll want if you're a Harry James fan. Both sides are instrumental and heavily feature the James horn—"Cherry," and "Jump Town." . . .

EARMARKS OF HITS:

It seems like I'm always talking about Frank Loesser, but you can't keep a good songwriter down, so here goes. His latest is a beautiful ballad, "Spring Will Be A Little Late This Year." Deanna Durbin sings it in "Xmas Holiday," and I think you'll be surprised at her rendition, something a little different for her. Incidentally she's tops vocally in "His Butler's Sister." . . .

Jimmy McHugh and Harold Adamson are two other boys who keep giving us pretty music. In "Around The World" there are two ditties very much worth listening to—"Candlelight and Wine" and "Don't Believe Everything You Dream." Gene de Paul's and Don Raye's "Star Eyes" looks okay for a star spot on the Hit Parade . . . Every once in a while the top singers and orchestra leaders start digging back and using some of the oldies, so in the revival department I think you'll be hearing "My Ideal," "Memory Lane" and "The Moon of Manakoora."

ON THE BEAM:

The Blue Network has a swell new Sunday show—"Radio Hall of Fame," and though it's variety in formula there are plenty of musical guests each week, so I advise you not to miss it . . . Connie Haines is back on the Abbott and Costello show over N.B.C. after completing a very successful theatre tour. . . .

Anita Ellis, the vocal star on Columbia's "Ceiling Unlimited" is the same girl who was featured on the "Songs Overseas" show and billed just as "Anita." . . . If you listen to the "Prudential Family Hour" on Sunday, and I presume most of you do, you've heard Jack Smith. To my way of thinking, he's one of the best male singers in radio, and I'm surprised that some record company or movie firm doesn't nab him. . . .

JAM NOTES:

Horace Heidt is back in Hollywood after a five-month tour of theatres and service camps . . . Freddy Martin's new singer, Tommy Randall, is an ex-concert singer and was recently mustered out of the Marines after having been wounded in action . . . Contrary-wise Don Raye, the songwriter, has been inducted into the Army and Vaughn Monroe is 1A and will probably be in the service by the time you read this. . . .

Harriet Hilliard and Ozzie Nelson recently celebrated their eighth wedding anniversary, which proves that some people can stay happily married in Hollywood . . . Al Sack, well-known conductor and arranger, and responsible for all the music on Paul Whiteman's summer show, has been named musical director for the Blue Network.

. . . Gene Krupa you'll be glad to know has been playing with Benny Goodman during his New York engagements and at this writing is planning to go overseas with Benny if the deal works out for the band to make the trip . . . Dinah Shore has been signed by International Films to star in a million dollar technicolor musical to be called "The Belle Of The Yukon." Randy Scott will be her leading man. . . .

Kay Kyser has been suffering tremendously with arthritis, and is forced to do his broadcasts from a specially built wheelchair. His doctors told him his condition was aggravated by overwork on camp shows. . . .

Teddy Powell married recently Marguerite James, the skating star . . . Ivy Anderson, who more or less retired when she left the Ellington band, has been singing around Hollywood in the smaller clubs. It's nice to hear her again . . . No matter what you hear, the truth is that when Helen Forrest left Harry James to go out on her own it was an entirely friendly parting, with Harry giving her his blessings. After playing theatres, she will undoubtedly land a radio show . . . Helen Ward replaced her with the James outfit. . . .

Buddy Rich has almost completely recovered from the serious eye injury he received during his training as a Marine raider in San Diego, California. He visited Charlie Spivak on Charlie's last night at the Orpheum in Los Angeles, and came up on the stage and played a one-man concert, bringing the house down. He remains one of the greatest drummers in the business, although the only chance he gets to play is during his short leaves . . . Jean Darrell, NBC songstress and a member of the Music Maids, signed up with a USO show for overseas entertaining and was sent to the Middle East in a unit headed by Fredric March . . . Phil Harris is back on the musical scene. He and his band are appearing at Slapsie Maxie's in Hollywood. . . .

THE END

ALAN LADD walked through the doorway of his house, followed by the four boys who had been honorably discharged along with him from the Santa Barbara Air Base Hospital.

The boys were going to stay with him and Sue for the two days until they got their train reservations that would take them back to their homes in the East.

Their presence would crowd the small house that was Alan's and Sue's. But Alan was glad of that crowding. It made him feel like "army" for a little longer.

As soon as he and Sue had arranged where the boys would sleep, one on the living room couch, one on the couch in the playroom and two of them in the very small guest room, he went upstairs to change.

This was a moment for which he'd dreamed over a year. He'd whiled away hours in mess halls and drill fields, thinking about putting on those smoothly tailored suits again, suits that really fit his broad chest. He'd had positive nostalgia for his ties. He had always been a nut for ties. His first money as a teen-age earner had gone for a maroon striped tie, and when he signed his present Paramount contract, he had gone distinctly wacky over two dozen Sulka numbers.

But now, as he shed the khaki and slipped into a gabardine that had cost him as much as two months of his corporal's pay, he felt no glow. To begin with, the suit no longer fitted. It hung on him like a pup tent, showing up his weight loss of twenty pounds as visibly as an X-ray plate could have. He knotted his favorite tie, correctly dimpling it, and that did no good, either. He did not look like the best dressed man. He didn't even look natty. And he felt as though somebody had sliced him through the heart. The moment he had waited for more than a year had arrived, and it was very sour champagne indeed.

He was a civilian once more. He could go back to acting. He could live at home and have Susie and his tiny daughter, Alana, always close to him. It should have been a great feeling. It wasn't.

"I suppose," said Alan as we talked about it, "it was my realization, right then, that the war was over for me—but not for the world. I suppose any soldier when he thinks of peace, thinks in personal terms, of his wife, his child. You think of meals served on shining tablecloths, of sleeping till eight or ten, maybe in a real bed with cool, white sheets. But when you're released as I was, an enlisted man with an honorable medical discharge, you discover being out of service is not what you really wanted. You dreamed of your freedom in personal terms, but granted it, you find out that what you really wanted was impersonal. You wanted out for the whole world. You wanted world peace. You wanted every man to be a civilian again, not merely you, by yourself."

Sitting there in the small, green damask-hung living room of the Ladds, no writer could fail to recognize Alan's sincerity and sense of depression. It isn't easy to explain how a hulk of a sun-tanned guy like Alan can actually have been dangerously far from well, unless you know his type. In Alan's case, his real personality has been pretty carefully hidden up to date. He's been playing killers ever since his first click in "This Gun for Hire." The truth of the matter is that he is really about as much of a killer as baby Alana. That cold, steely screen glance of his is a triumph of good acting. In actuality, he is a sensitive, dreamy romantic, madly possessive where his wife, Sue Carol, is concerned, infatuated where his baby daughter, Alana, is concerned, and mentally driven by a passion for acting and an almost consuming ambition.

It is like this with Alan: when he was first working on "This Gun for Hire" (that picture that was to turn the hitherto miserable tide of his career and make him the most important star discovery of 1942) he caught a severe cold. Paramount told him to stay home till he got over it. Sue begged him to let her call the doctor. Alan paid no attention to anyone's orders, until the evening when he left the studio and got such shakes in the car going home that Sue drove him straight to a doctor's office, where the medical man discovered he was walking around with a temperature of 104. The doctor announced that Alan had pneumonia in both lungs, ordered him home to bed for a week. "If you go back to work under a week, you will undoubtedly die," the medico said.

So what? So Alan crawled out of bed on the third day, went back to work and spent the rest of the week doing the scenes where he ran up and down a railroad bridge and finally jumped off onto a moving train!

Paramount, sensing the hit they had in "This Gun for Hire," rushed him straight into another film, after the manner of all studios when they believe they have a red-hot personality. This opus was "The Glass Key"

Alan Ladd, U. S. Army retired. His first pictures, out of uniform. Twenty pounds lighter than he was when he donned khaki, his old civilian clothes all had to be re-tailored.

No more eating in the Army mess hall for Alan. No more field drilling, reporting for roll call. Instead, he's fated to a diet of milk, crackers and cheese, must have a complete rest.

and Alan, not yet fully recovered from the effects of the pneumonia, went into it, again with a temperature. He rattled his way through it, registering on the screen all the while as though he had the strength of wild cats, and it wasn't until the film was finally wrapped up, that he collapsed. He went to bed for two weeks then, though at that time Paramount put a ban upon his illness even being mentioned. What kind of a build-up was it for an iron-muscled killer to admit colds were always stalking him, and that while working, he could very rarely eat?

The Army discharged Alan because of a stomach ailment, and it is no small wonder when you go back a bit in Alan's youth. A poverty-stricken childhood, followed by a poverty-stricken young manhood, and every day of it flaming with loneliness, misunderstanding, disappointment and that wild, fierce determination to succeed. People like that don't spend time or money on getting "the right diet." They have other more important things to do, or so they think then.

Alan, for instance, is one of those guys who either is the best at a thing or he won't play at all. He became one of the finest junior divers in California, as a kid, by keeping a springboard in the garage and practicing on it until he nearly knocked the garage down. Some kid told him it would improve his diving form if he slept with his legs tied to boards at night. So Alan did.

When he went in for ballroom dancing, he went in for the prizes and won them. Today he won't do a rhumba in public. He actually does an excellent rhumba, but it isn't the best in Hollywood. So he sits them out. He plays fair golf and tennis, but since he isn't tops, he can't be inveigled into either game. This is merely my hunch, but I'll wager that one thing that got those stomach nerves of his jangling was that he couldn't be tops in the Army. His ambition, his talent, his charm, couldn't shoot him to the top in the Army. He had to be just another guy in the mob there.

Not that he ever tried to wangle himself promotions. Not that he even tried to go in on a commissioned basis. Alan enlisted, you know. As a father, he could have stayed out for a good long while. As an ambitious joe, just finally started on the ascendancy of one of the most brilliant careers Hollywood has ever seen, he could have stayed out. It would have been no disgrace to him, as it isn't to some two or three million other Americans, if he'd waited for his draft board to call him. But like a couple of million different other Americans, while he didn't want to leave his job, his wife and the baby-to-be, he couldn't wait.

Another characteristic that the real Alan possesses that is completely at variance with the deadly killer he plays is that he never plans things out. He does everything by impulse. He does things like this: He often wakes in the night and decides that he wants to go dancing. Fortunately for their happiness, Sue Carol likes such impulses. Susie gets up and goes out gaily on these occasions. But Sue was anything but gay on the day Alan came home from the studio and said he had enlisted. She nearly collapsed, thinking of having to go through having their baby, alone.

Once in service, Alan never got even the hope of action, which was another thing (Continued on page 76)

Home sweet home, with all the comforts he missed while living the life of a soldier. Given his choice, though, Alan claims he'd rather be back with the boys, till peace is really won.

Imagine being married to someone who may wake up in the middle of the night, and want to go dancing! That's what Sue Carol puts up with, but she likes her husband's mad impulses.

LORETTA YOUNG

and a Recipe for Happiness

BY FREDDA DUDLEY

IT happened at an army base. Four unfortunate recruits, detailed to K. P. duty, peered out of the kitchen door in the direction of the slim, laughing girl who was talking to a group of khakis on the drill field.

One said, "D'ya know who that is? That's Loretta Young. She's been my favorite actress ever since I can remember."

Another observed bitterly, "Just my luck to draw K. P. when she visits camp. That's me—always missing out. At Christmas time I was in the infirmary having measles."

The first K. P. dropped his peeling knife. "Look—I think she's coming this way. Boy, oh boy, wotta break!"

He was right.. Loretta had asked to see the platoon kitchens. After she had shaken hands all around she said, "How about lending me a knife and a few potatoes, boys? I want to do my share toward dinner."

Speechless with admiring awe, the mess sergeant handed her a knife and the required vegetables. Then, having accomplished the beau geste, she autographed the sergeant's apron and the fatigue caps of his crew.

"My husband is a soldier, so I sympathize with all your problems," Loretta explained.

This crack produced a nice laugh. Her husband a soldier, indeed! A mere lieutenant colonel, a minor army character wearing simple silver leaves, that was all. The privates, first class, grinned. What a nice dame!

After she had moved on, the recruits hesitated in the doorway, staring after her through a haze of admiration. "A gingham dress—just like the one my sis used to wear on summer afternoons back home," said one nostalgically.

"No gloves," sighed a second.

"Not even a hat," praised a third. "Look at that gorgeous hair!"

The mess sergeant summed it up: "There goes," he announced belligerently "a gosh-swell girl."

His observation, had he only known it, was not unique. There have been hundreds of persons in Hollywood who have known for a long time that Loretta Young Lewis is a gosh-swell girl.

What makes her so? What gives her the humor, the balance, the kindliness, which reveal her as an outstanding actress in such pictures as Walter Wanger's "When Ladies Fly," yet permit her to stand unique as daughter, wife and mother?

A friend, discussing it, said recently, "I think Loretta has worked out from unhappiness she has suffered some formula for present-day, grown-up happiness."

That unconscious formula was in the making when Loretta, in third or fourth grade at school, came running home unexpectedly one noon to secure a dime for Chinese Relief (yes, even in those days).

As she swung around the corner, breathless, she saw her mother watering the grass. Mrs. Young always wore a huge white apron over her light house dress for this task. On her hands she wore clean white cotton gloves, and on her head she wore a summery garden hat. "My mother," thought Loretta, "is the most beautiful lady in the world. When I come up to her she's going to look surprised. Then she's going to say 'Hello, honey, what are you doing home?' When I tell her about the school collection, she'll put down the hose, reach into her apron pocket and take out her little coin purse."

It happened exactly that way, even to the very words her mother spoke.

Afterward, Loretta thought—on her way back to school—"My mother always has time for me. She always knows how important dimes are for Chinese Relief or Armenian Relief or the Red Cross. She never scolds me for running home in the middle of the day when she knows that I think the trip is important. I have a very understanding mother."

And now, observe how that happiness formula carried forward. One afternoon recently Loretta had returned, in a semi-exhausted condition, from a grueling day at the studio. She told the housekeeper that she was going to lie down and she didn't want to be disturbed, meaning that she would like to be spared any frivolous interruption.

She was dozing when she heard seven-year-old Judy, her adopted daughter, fretting over a slight juvenile problem. "I'm going to ask Mommy," she said. "She always tells me the right answer."

The housekeeper, anxious to protect Loretta, told Judy, "You just calm yourself and wait until later to ask questions. Your mother is too tired to be bothered with you right now."

Loretta sat up with a bounce and called her daughter. "I didn't mean that I was too tired to talk to you," she explained quickly, to soothe young feelings. "I just didn't want to answer the telephone or have to make household decisions. But I'm never too tired or too busy for you, darling. I love you too much, ever to think that you're a bother."

Judy's face was suddenly

Throughout the whole house are artistic old Mexican decorative items, all souvenirs of her honeymoon with Col. Lewis, in the romantic land "south of the border." Her enthusiasm for the Latin country is evidenced by the many pieces of work which she brought back for her home. And she's the gainer, we'd say, from this gesture of "good neighborliness."

Unhappy Ending

The saddest news of the Hollywood month is that the love

by AVERY CARROLL

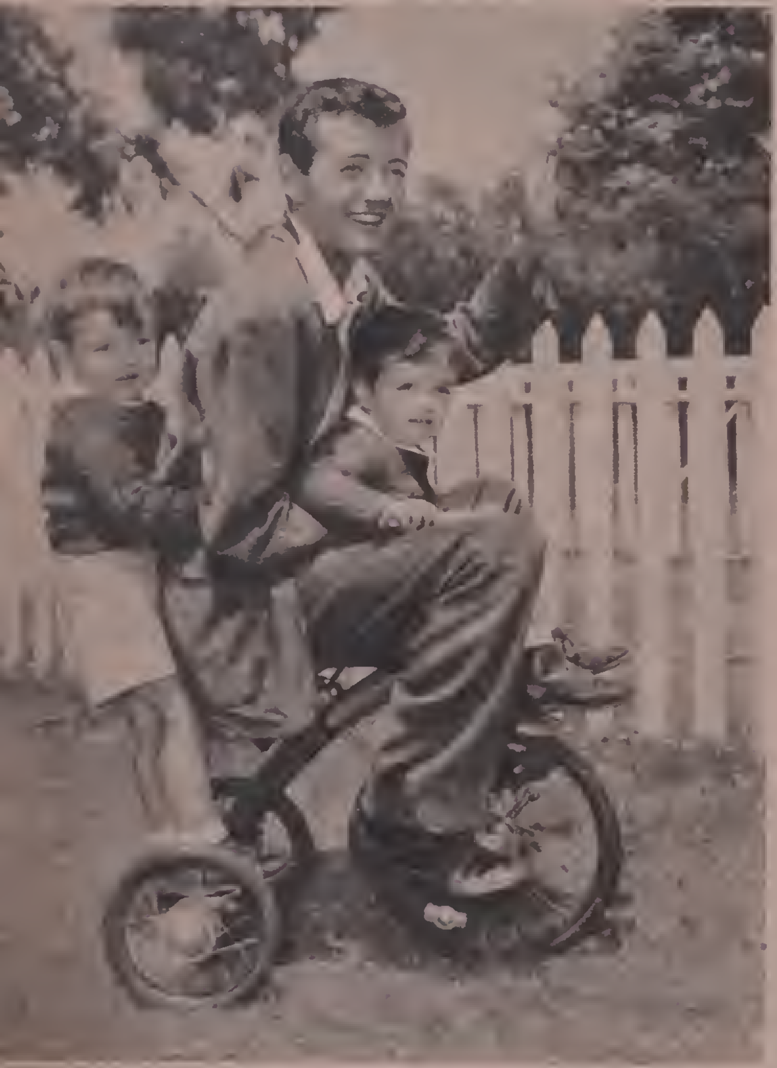
IT was the kind of romance that we all love to see: Two youngsters with box office appeal. . Two young actors on the road up. . . together. Then it is no more. Separation has been announced by both parties concerned. As marriage is, even in Hollywood, a private affair, only Jennifer Jones and Robert Walker know the bitter "whys and wherefores". All we have left is a twinge in our hearts, for this was a marriage we thought was secure because it was based on congeniality and earnest effort.

In January 1938 a slender, purposeful girl enrolled at the Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York. Her name was Phylis Isley, and she had come from Tulsa, Oklahoma.

You say that Hollywood and careers don't mix? Well, this is one time the blame can't be placed here! The Robert Walkers are new arrivals on the horizon. It looked like a beautiful romance from afar, and it had a lovely beginning, for here is the story.

Of course, young Phylis Isley had no definite premonition that one day she would be Hollywood's Jennifer Jones, or that she would be starred in her first picture for 20th Century-Fox, "The Song of Bernadette." Nor did she have any notion that she would become Mrs. Robert Walker and that Robert Walker would, in his first screen appearance, bowl the world over in MGM's "Bataan."

All she knew that keen January day was that she had



The three men in the Walker family are look-alikes, with eyes that are soft and laughing. It's Michael on behind, Bobbie riding the handle bars. The family split bewilders them all.

It took only one picture, "Bataan," to wow the critics into giving Bob Walker star rating. "See Here, Private Hargrove," his second, is an even greater personal triumph. He's on the road to success and traveling at high speed.

story of Jennifer Jones and Robert Walker is no more

Jennifer Jones, discovered for "The Song of Bernadette" (20th Century-Fox) is the same girl who, as Phylis Isley, was scorned by Hollywood. Now her "Bernadette" is racing with Greer Garson's "Curie" for the Academy Award!

They loved studying scripts together for they fell in love that way, originally; but they couldn't make the marriage last. They both made a "marriage first" effort, but failed.

While together, Jennifer and Bob made home with the children as normal as possible. They built their lives around their kids and did a lot of living as a family group.

a rendezvous with Fate. Fate, in those days, was wearing a substantial tweed suit and an earnest air; he was also enrolled at the Academy, and he appeared in the first class Jennifer attended. She looked at Bob and thought, "He's handsome. He's got the charm of Jimmie Stewart and the comic flare of Henry Fonda, only more so."

Robert Walker was given lines to read—an excerpt from "Until Dawn." Jennifer thought him arrestingly good. Then she was given passages to read from "The Armless Venus." From the tail of her eye she performed a brief reconnaissance of Mr. Walker's features when she had finished. He seemed to have found her performance highly satisfactory. There appeared to be blue-flamed candles deep in his eyes.

Day followed day, each more divine than the one preceding. There came the day when the activity on the curriculum was the combining of lines into scenes; dramatic inter-relation of play character upon play character. The play chosen for Jennifer and Bob was "The Barretts of Wimpole Street."

For exercise, Jennifer memorized Elizabeth Barrett's confession of faith—

"How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace."

Not, you understand, that the little girl from Tulsa was in love with the tall boy from Ogden, Utah. Don't be absurd. They were simply school friends, striving toward a common goal: dramatic perfection. Poetry happened to be lovely . . . and quite beside the point. (If you wish to imagine Cupid grinning in the distance, that's your own affair.)

The next play selected was "Romeo and Juliet," a thing written by W. Shakespeare, the Englishman, of whom you may have heard. Heretofore, Jennifer had looked upon it with favor; even, in those starry moments of one's adolescence, she had imagined herself in jeweled cap, velvet bodice, twenty-five-yard skirt, and ecstatic mood . . . leaning over a balcony.

"Yet I should kill thee with much cherishing.
Good-night, good-night! Parting is such sweet sorrow
That I shall say good-night till it be morrow.
Sleep dwell upon thine eyes, peace in thy breast!
Would I were sleep and peace, so sweet to rest!"

The only trouble was that, not Jennifer, but another girl in the class was given the soft lines with which to respond to Mr. Walker's Romeo. Jennifer sat in the back row, lower lip out-thrust, chin sunk in palm, and glowered at the stage. The love scenes were almost too much for her; she suddenly discovered that it wasn't a ham sandwich she had enjoyed for luncheon, but Mexican jumping beans that didn't like their new home.

This proves that no one, up to this point, was in love with anyone. Um-huh.

On Sundays, these two earnest students decided that it would be sensible for them to spend the day together . . . so they could cue one another. They rode back and forth all afternoon on the ferry. Then leaned on the rail and studied the skyline. They watched the people.

Robert Walker and Jennifer Jones—they crashed movieland at the same time; but there was something lacking in their marital relationship.

"There's a character for you, Bob. I'll bet he's a visitor to New York. He's from . . . well, maybe Montana. He's a miner—notice the pork pie hat. That suit—he bought it for his son's wedding seventeen years ago. If you ever had to play a miner, Bob, you could remember him, and you'd really be convincing."

And Bob said, paying more attention to a nearby profile than to his study of a quaint character, "I'll bet you're photogenic. You have the cutest nose and the biggest eyes. I'll bet you get a chance in pictures some day."

"Don't," cautioned Jennifer . . . ruining her chances to be considered a clairvoyant, "be silly."

Sometimes, having wearied of the waves, they wandered along Fifth Avenue, window-wishing. "What is your favorite color, Bob?"

"Oh, blue, I guess. I really go for a girl in a blue dress."

Make a mental note, Jennifer: purchase one blue dress.

They rode a double-deck bus and Jennifer took off her hat to let the spring wind ruffle her hair. "You have," vouchsafed Bob, "sort of nice hair. Pretty shade of brown. Your name should have been Jeanie."

They walked through Central Park, feeding the squirrels and delighting passersby with their quips. Bob has a flare for comedy, a droll, quiet sense of humor. "Have you noticed that old people, after they've been married for years, begin to resemble one another?" he asked one day. "Imagine me," he added, glancing sidelong at Jennifer's insouciant profile, "with a lily-bud nose."

The summer holiday was approaching despite one girl's subconscious attempt to do a Lady Joshua and hold the Now forever. One day Bob announced with a grin, "I just signed on a freighter going to South America. Won't that be an experience?"

"Can you swim?" demanded Feminine Apprehension.

"Aw, sure. I've been swimming since I was knee high. Besides, I'm so tall and thin that I'd float like a plank. On land or sea, I'm still a Walker."

So Bob went south, and Jennifer went back to Tulsa and made friends with the postman. Not that she really expected a letter, you understand, but one can never tell. There just might be a port of call from which a postcard could be dispatched. Meanwhile she had the usual summer fun, dancing, working in a little theater, playing tennis and golf.

Long afterward she learned that Bob had written one letter, but it must have gone astray because it never reached Tulsa. That summer must go down in history, notable for its refusal to pass. For three months, time stood still. Only by some miracle did September . . . and the day for Jennifer to return to New York . . . finally arrive.

As it was, she arrived two weeks before school was scheduled to start. That first night back in town, her family had arranged by letter for a priest (a long-time friend of the Isleys) to take Jennifer to dinner. The priest had asked another clergyman to join them so the evening was well planned.

Jennifer had just descended to the lobby of the Barbizon Hotel for Women and was chatting with the Reverend Father when a (Continued on page 77)

Now I DARE TELL

BY TOM DE VANE

Now a Defense Worker, But He Certainly Knows Hollywood All Too Well

I HAD a letter from a movie fan the other day. She is my own particular fan, and she hails from El Paso, Texas. We used to exchange occasional letters when I was a regular contributor to the film magazines—and since she hadn't seen my name in print for over a year, she thought I might be in uniform.

I am not in uniform, unless you consider blue dungarees and a sweatshirt a uniform. I am now a defense worker, and live in a coast town hundreds of miles away from Hollywood. Instead of pounding a typewriter, I am helping build trucks for the Army, whose physical test I couldn't pass.

But for my fan in El Paso, who wonders whether I don't miss talking to the glamorous ones of the screen, the answer is . . . yes. During my years as a magazine reporter, I had some splendid moments. Some funny, a few incongruous, but none dull. And a few scattered incidents will prove why I consider Hollywood a fascinating place, and why I hope to continue to report on its foibles . . . at a more peaceful day.

De Vane talked fast around Jane Wyman right.

THESE STORIES

There was the case of Ann Sothern and her hangover.

Now movie stars, although they are often photographed informally at night clubs, at tables loaded with champagne glasses, are never supposed to touch alcohol off the screen . . . especially at MGM, where the stars are treated with reverence and awe by their publicists.

I had mentioned to one of these guardians, on our way to a set where Miss Sothern was enacting a "Maizie" adventure, that I was acquainted with the lady. (As a matter of fact, I had first met her when, as Harriet Lake, she was leading lady of a road company of "Of Thee I Sing.") Ann greeted me warmly, exchanged a few bits of gossip about mutual friends, and then sank wearily into a chair. "Oh dear," she said sadly. "I'm really not myself today. I have the most awful hangover."

The MGM publicist, I swear, turned a pale green. Greer Garson and Joan Crawford never had a hangover. Miss Sothern, hand to brow, was oblivious to the havoc she had caused. "You know," she continued, "I practically never drink anything stronger than iced tea. All my friends know that. But yesterday at a cocktail party, something happened to me that made me mad, and I decided to get tight. I drank . . ." she paused impressively, "three Martinis!"

If I gasped, it was only because I had seen other stellar ladies lapping their Martinis direct from the shaker. However, I was taken aside and asked not to mention the episode in my story. Personally, I thought it was sort of cute.

Although I didn't know it at the time, I was present at the birth of a great Hollywood romance. I was chatting with Miss Lucille Ball, whom I had known before becoming a magazine writer. Lucille was waxing enthusiastic over the fact that she was at last getting good parts—she was soon to begin in "Too Many Girls," her first lead in a big budget film. Every so often she would hang out of the second story window of the RKO wardrobe department and scream a greeting to one of her many bosom pals, walking or riding on the street below.

Finally a long sleek topless touring car approached at a crawl. Behind a uniformed driver sat a handsome young man, dressed in gleaming white, his black hair uncovered to the California sun. Miss Ball let out an appreciative whistle. "Well!" she exclaimed.

I felt very superior, since I had seen the young man on the New York stage only a couple of months before, and knew who he was. "That," I said smugly, "is your new leading man, Desi Arnaz."

Lucille did not reply for a moment. There was a far-away look in her eye. "Well," she repeated, "that's for me!" (And Mr. Arnaz, of course, was dead duck from that point on . . . and very happily so.)

The oddest interview I ever had was with the stunning Jane Russell, who may yet go down in history as the only movie star who was never seen on the screen. This was one story I was particularly anxious to do, since Those Pictures had just begun to come out, and I was filled with a purely scientific interest to discover if the camera could possibly lie so beautifully.

The interview was to take place in the elaborate Beverly Hills offices of Russell Birdwell, who for some reason gets as many columns of space about his genius as a press agent as he does for his clients. I arrived ahead of time, and was promptly handed a "biography" of the lady. "Jane was always the tomboy type," it said breathlessly. "She never liked to play with dolls, but preferred to romp and climb trees with her brothers and boy friends."

I was envying brothers and the boys when Miss Russell entered the sanctum wearing a little number that Howard Green never intended to be found in the branches of a slippery elm. A quick look convinced me that the camera did not lie. Jane was a super-lulu.

Prompted by one of Mr. Birdwell's associates, one word led to another, and soon Jane was unburdening her girlish heart. "You know," she said seriously, "I never dreamed that I would ever be in pictures. I was too much of a tomboy. Mother never could get me to play with dolls. I was generally out playing with the boys, you know, climbing trees and things like that."

It was the easiest interview I ever had. Miss Russell didn't deviate one iota from Mr. Birdwell's biography. It was his story, and she was stuck with it.

In bewildering contrast was the devastatingly frank Maria Montez. There are two schools of thought on Miss Montez. One school, mostly women, considers her a snippity witch, to put it mildly. The other group (of which I am a charter member) considers her one of the most provocative damsels to hit demure Hollywood in years. Some of her comments on various sacred cinema personalities, with right names, would have landed both Montez and me in court with libel suits, if I'd had the nerve to repeat them. I still haven't got the nerve.

Miss Bette Davis is deservedly popular with the magazine writers, as she is with workers in every other branch of the film industry. Her interviews are conducted with neatness and dispatch. They are arranged several days in advance, and Miss Davis insists upon knowing just what the topic of the interview is to be. She wants to have her answers ready, and she wants them to make sense. Bette is still a top movie lady, and she is well aware that she has a position to maintain.

Miss Davis was quite annoyed with me for several months, and I didn't know a thing about it until a mutual friend tipped me off, and finally straightened it out. One of the last "press junkets" arranged by Warner Brothers, was a trip to Death Valley, where Bette and Jimmy Cagney were making a movie that didn't do credit to either of them. About thirty members of the fourth estate were flown in a chartered plane to the location scene, and I was the only one of the group who wrote exclusively for the film magazines.

It was a nice trip, but with one thing and another, I had no chance to talk to Miss Davis. However, a couple of months later, a story appeared in one of the magazines I wrote for, brazenly titled "Why I Married Again—by Bette Davis." It was quite a chatty story, full of intimate quotes from Miss Davis, answers to questions that I would never have asked.

Bette was furious, and I don't blame her. But since I was the only "fan writer" on the trip, she figured I must be the guilty party. When word finally got to me that she was "very hurt," I had to reply that I had far too much sincere respect for her to write a story without her authorization . . . and that at least three newspaper reporters on the trip also were contributors, under other names, to the movie magazines.

Most of the big stars take their interviews very seriously and carefully go over the manuscripts, armed with blue pencils. But for the most part, they rarely correct anything but direct quotes.

Ann Sheridan, for whom I have a far warmer personal regard than any other movie star, is one who doesn't bother reading interviews before they're printed in magazines. "I'd rather read 'em in print," she has often told writers. "And besides, I know you wouldn't write anything I wouldn't like."

And with Sheridan, this isn't a case of soft-soaping the writers. The natural and unpretentious Ann honestly feels that everyone is her friend, because she likes practically everyone. And for that reason, she had one of the most consistently favorable press careers of any Hollywood actress.

Perc Westmore and Betty advanced their romance to the point of picking out the ring, but the marriage plans went on the rocks, right in the shadow of the altar.

Betty Hutton is a rare kind of cutie who is a mixture of glamour and comedy. She's been a blonde bombshell, and so named, ever since her debut in "The Fleet's In."

In between more serious loves, Betty's social life is active with eligibles around Hollywood the likes of Wynn Rocamoro, actors' agent, who's with her here.

BETTY HUTTON'S
Fearless Story of Her Life and Loves
Part II

BY DOROTHY MANNERS

PERHAPS the reason that little Betty Hutton has such appeal is that she is always herself. She has no pretence in her nature. She honestly wants her public to know the truth about how she got her start, singing at the church festivities, singing and dancing for coins, getting exactly nowhere at the age of fourteen in New York. Her straightforward frankness about the chances for her long distance romance with New Yorker Charles Martin appeals to everyone who understands that a coast-to-coast romance is likely to have slip ups. The fact that she admits her failures of the past is an interesting factor in her popularity of today. She and her sister, Marion, also a singer, were left alone with "Mom" when they were tiny girls when their father deserted them never to return. Those were tough years. Yes, it's her complete honesty and natural charm that shows up again, as this current story of the men in her life continues:

BETTY HUTTON is the only artist in the world who was ever a "has been" at the ripe old age of fourteen; and before she ever made a professional appearance. New York had turned her down cold without even one try-out for a show or a radio program. The final humiliation, when a man in a booking office had told her to go home and "grow up"—and had even loaned her the train fare back to Mama—was more than she could bear.

"I'm all washed up. I'm through," she wailed to her mother.

"But, darling, you are only fourteen."

"So what?" Betty wept. "Shirley Temple was a star at five!"

In spite of the spectre of old age creeping up on her before she could get started, Betty finally got a job that winter with a local band at the Lansing Hotel. The leader had known her from her kid days of singing in the beer gardens, and while there wasn't much money connected with his offer, it was a "professional" engagement.

"Mama made my dress, a little white lace affair with blue bows," Betty says, "and the effect was very sweet-girl graduate. It must have had a subduing quality, for I sang that first night with all the 'refeenment' of a visiting concert star."

But "refeenment" or not, Mr. Luck was riding with her. That very first night Betty sang with the local boys, a very interested gentleman named Vincent Lopez was eating dinner at a ringside table. Lopez was in town to fill an engagement at the best place, and he had dropped into the hotel to dine before his own show started.

He was impressed with Betty—not so much with her voice, but with her youth and freshness. Making a lightning decision, he decided to gamble on her as a featured singer with his band and offered her the job that very night.

"Did I take it? Boy, I was right in the thick of things when the Lopez band opened at the Fox Theater in Detroit the following week!"

It would be nice to report that from there on Betty was in the caviar. But it didn't turn out that way. Frankly, she was far from a sensation with Lopez. He was disappointed, because he liked the eager little kid who was so anxious to get over. But it isn't up to a band leader to argue with the paying customers, who remained on the apathetic side when she sang.

Betty said: "One of the boys in the orchestra tipped me off that I was going to get the Ax!"

As she was telling me this life story, even the memory of that black moment caused her to spring from the chair in her Hollywood apartment and to start pacing the floor letting off some of the steam that is part and parcel of her makeup. She ran her fingers through her hair and yelled, "Murder! Was I mad?"

At the Stork Club in New York, Betty Hutton with radio director Charles Martin. It was at this party that Betty sprang her news, their intent-to-wed declaration. Was anyone very much surprised?

She wasn't mad at Lopez, nor at the boy who had told her she was about to be fired. "I was mad at myself! Here I was, a failure—again! And this time I couldn't say I hadn't had a chance."

The Betty Thornburg who strode onto the bandstand that final night was a feminine wildcat. She was so furious with herself she could hardly sing at all. But she could yell—and she did!

She shouted, she stamped, she batted the microphone around, waved her arms, threw vicarious punches in the air. She raced across the stage and vaulted on top of the piano, shrieking the lyrics at the microphone that was at least ten feet away from her. For a finale she made a flying tackle at the mike—and sent it crashing. In short, she "tore up the joint."

It was a magnificent performance of a dynamo in action, and it brought the house down. The crowd yelled and stamped for more, almost as lustily as Betty had done.

Without knowing it she had given her first sensational performance as the one-and-only Betty Hutton. "Why haven't you done that before?" Lopez cried, hugging her after the show. "You were wonderful! They were crazy about you!"

But Betty didn't answer. She had knocked herself out—cold!

That night marked the end of her career as Betty June Thornburg. From there on she was Betty Hutton—a name worked out for her by Lopez, who is something more than a dabbler in numerology. The minute Betty clicked he had argued that the Thornburg part of her name was "depressive." After a week of going into private huddles with the "numbers," Lopez cropped up with the name of "Hutton" for his singing star. Betty Hutton. "It has a solid sound," he explained. "It will be good luck for you."

"And it has been lucky for me—in my career!" Betty admitted, calming down and seating herself again, cross-legged on the divan. "Ever since I have been 'Betty Hutton' everything has broken right for me where my work is concerned. I stayed with Vince's band and opened with him in my first big league engagement at Billy Rose's Casa Mañana in New York.

"I was sixteen then, still tearing the place to pieces when I sang, and everyone was wonderful to me. I couldn't believe some of the notices I got. Neither could Mama—so she started my scrapbook just so we could read them over now and then and make sure we hadn't dreamed them.

"And the Luck didn't run out when I got my first show on Broadway, 'Two For the Show.' After that came a season of vaudeville, carrying my own act—and that was a thrill, too. And still more Luck when Buddy De Sylva offered me one of the top roles in his 'Panama Hattie'—a show that will probably live on forever in revivals.

"Gosh, it was wonderful to be in a hit like that. Ethel Merman, the star, was an angel to me. I had to pinch myself sometimes—me, just a green kid from the sticks, traveling in the same company as Ethel Merman.

"Don't ever let anybody tell you that the really big stars are jealous of newcomers. The bigger the star, the less you have to worry. It's only the second raters who try to keep you down. Ethel is so marvelous she doesn't have to worry about me—or anybody else. When I left the show to come to Hollywood for the movies, Merman gave me a big topaz ring.

Victor Mature, home on leave, had a few dining and dancing dates with Betty, which amounted to no more than just a few pleasant evenings. She was "otherwise in love," at the time.

"And Hollywood has been lucky for 'Betty Hutton,' too," the ex-Miss Thornburg went on. "I mean lucky for the gal the writers call Bounding Betty, or the Blonde Blitz, or the Platinum Screwball, or Hectic Hutton. When the columnists started labeling me after my first movie, 'The Fleet's In,' the boys in the publicity department told me I was over the hurdle. I couldn't believe it when I got star billing with Bing Crosby and Bob Hope and Zorina and those people in 'Star Spangled Rhythm.' Yeah," she repeated, "Betty Hutton has done all right up front."

"What about the girl behind the front, Betty?" I asked. "What about the Loves in the Life of the Hectic Hutton?"

I was thinking then of the long list of beaux Betty's had since she came to Hollywood two years ago. There was Sid Luft, the good-looking test pilot who, by the time this is printed, will be married to Lynn Bari. Sid was the first beau Betty had in Hollywood.

Then there was Perc Westmore, the beautician, with whom she was very much in love and who did so much to develop the chic and smartness of the Betty Hutton today.

She had a few odd dining and dancing dates with Victor Mature, when he was on leave. But it was still apparent, at that time, that "the" important man had not yet come along in Betty's life.

That's the conclusion one would naturally draw, except for one thing: except for radio director Charles Martin, of whom Betty spoke so frankly in our first interview. Direct as she was, in telling about her love for Martin, it shouldn't have been such a surprise when, just a few weeks later, the couple announced their intention to wed, to friends at a Stork Club party in New York.

As the reporters have it, Betty arrived in New York with a contingent of Hollywood stars on a war bond tour. Then bango, she breaks the news about her forthcoming marriage!

"One thing," Betty says, "I'm not the subtle type." Nevertheless, if she was planning that marriage announcement, at the time of this interview, she was subtle enough in her comments on her love life to allay all suspicion that such news was about to happen. She claimed then—and incidentally, broke all records by being one of the first women stars ever to make such an admission—that she was not lucky with men."

"Maybe it is my fault," she said. "Maybe I expect too much. Perhaps I want one man to be too many men—a pal, a dancing partner, an understanding ear for my troubles, a gag man and a serious someone who can understand me—all at once.

"I guess they don't come that way. I don't know. One thing I do know, though, is that I can't pretend with someone I really like. If I like a man, he knows it. It just isn't in me to go in for all the clever little tricks like pretending I won't be in when he calls—or calling up some other man to take me out where he will see me, just to make his jealous.

"I'm the girl who is at home right by the telephone when someone I like has told me he will call. I'm dressed and ready when he arrives to take me to dinner. If he's having a good time and wants to stay at a party, I can't drag him away by pleading an early call, or that I'm bored.

"If he wants to eat at a Drive-In instead of the Mocambo, that's all right with me. And I can't fly into a 'pretty pet,' if at the last (Continued on page 72)

Lana and husband Steve Crane, supping at the Trocadero. They have a lot in common, these two. Among other things, they both love to dance. They like to go places, but hate the distance between points. Evenings out are fun, and they always have a good time—together.

MY LANA TURNER By Stephen Crane

AS TOLD TO GLADYS HALL

YOU know how a woman describes a man. He's "good looking," and that covers everything. Well, trying to sum up my impressions of Lana, I can't seem to do much better. All I can think of is "she's wonderful." I know that leaves a lot to be said.

I would like her even if she hadn't put some kind of spell on me, with her beauty and her all-around plain goodness as a person. The more I know the Lana behind the glamour, the more I like her as another human being.

Her beauty caught my eye, too, of course; but what really swept me off my feet was to find out that the girl is also a very complete individual: smart, intelligent, understanding and well, as I said before, wonderful.

The first time I saw Lana in person was in Chicago. We didn't meet, but after all, you don't see a girl as beautiful as that many times in a lifetime, so of course I didn't forget her. Then after I came to Hollywood, I'd see her at the West Side Tennis Club, the Palladium, and around.

Funny thing, we never met formally. I don't remember that anyone ever said, "Miss Turner, this is Mr. Crane." Considering that, in all my life, nothing as important ever happened to me, it is odd that I can't remember just when or where or how we did get together—but that, naturally, as if it were intended, we did.

I believe it was intended.

When we first started having dates, I found that Lana was different from what I had expected. I thought she'd be sweet, but superficial and—she'll shoot me for this—possibly beautiful but even a little dumb.

The Cranes at the Mocambo. Steve likes the way his wife dresses (who wouldn't!), and he likes her hair to be blonde. So she says she'll keep it that way.

Steve and Lana, arriving at the Hollywood premiere of "Guadalcanal Diary." No matter where she goes, Lana always causes a ripple of admiring sighs and is surrounded by men.

Calendar Girls

Turn to pages 46 and 47 and behold the first two of the Movieland calendar girls for 1944. They are, for February, the cute package about whom this story is written, and for January, that most dramatic of the teen-age stars, Joan Leslie.

And don't think we simply fell upon those particular girls for these two particular months. Heck no. They were born in 'em.

Joan was born January 26, just nineteen years ago come this January 26th. She dances, she sings, but she is actually the serious career girl. As yet, boys do not concern her.

Our Miss Turner, whom we photographed quite naturally as a Valentine sweetheart of a girl, was born February 8th. Her mama named her Mildred, but Lana thought up her own famous title. When it came to naming her own baby, she got fancy as all get-out. Cheryl Christina Crane, no less—but mighty pretty, we say.

Well, you can check that off as wrong. She is a smart little lady, knowing especially how to handle a husband, a baby and a home.

I found her to be a very shy person. This is because she is considerate. Both of us were lonely, and that helped to draw us together. I didn't fall in love at sight with Lana Turner, the glamorously beautiful screen star, but with a girl I wanted for my wife.

It is as my wife that I think of her, and, I'm humbly happy to say, that is the way she thinks of herself. By the time she gets her makeup off and the day's work at the studio is done, she is Mrs. Stephen Crane. And little Cheryl Christina's mother.

When Lana is at home, not working, we might as well not have a nurse for little Cheryl, for Lana does everything for her—feeds her, bathes her, and so on. If I miss Lana anywhere at home, I always know where to find her: in the nursery. Sometimes, in our living room of an evening, we'll look at each other suddenly and say, "Gosh, we've got a baby now!" Then I look at Lana and think to myself, "There's more to her, by far, than glamour alone. What a lucky guy I am."

Now wait a minute! I do not intend to give the impression that I think she can do everything. I am going to be blunt about it—she can't cook. No, sir; Lana is efficient in so many things—you should see her build one of her hats over the way she wants it—but when it comes to cooking, she dodges when the eggs explode in the skillet. Also, she always makes sure that I eat all I should, evidently fearing that I may be secretly starving myself to death—and yet she keeps so busy she forgets to eat her own meals. Yes, Lana has all those little feminine touches of contradiction that all husbands find so interesting.

She takes a long time to get dressed, trying on this or that outfit or looking at herself in two or three different hats before she makes up her mind which one she's going to wear. This, I don't mind, because when she gets everything all put together, it's really something.

You know what a puzzle women's clothes are to most men. Well, I like the way Lana dresses—she is definite about it. I'm in deep water here, possibly; but what I mean is she doesn't mix a fellow up. When she wears suits, they are suits, man-tailored. When she puts on feminine clothes they've got that feminine something. Her evening clothes are correct evening clothes. Her pinafores and playsuits are strictly in character. Certainly I notice how she dresses, and compliment her on her good taste and appearance.

In New York a few months ago when she had to have a new dress for a broadcast, Lana sent it home for my inspection and approval. That, (Continued on page 86)

THE BRIDGE OF SAN LUIS REY

OF all the wonders Brother Juniper had encountered in the New World since his arrival from Spain, none had impressed him so much as the Bridge. For more than a century it had hung there on the highroad between Lima and San Luis Rey, built by the ancient Incas of strong vines and wood fibres and to the little friar, as to all of Peru, it seemed a symbol of eternity stretched there across the gorge from mountain to mountain.

Then that morning so golden of sun and blue of sky, that morning when not so much as a breeze was stirring, there came that horrible sound of crackling and tearing as the vines and fibres broke, mingling with the screams of the travelers about to cross the bridge and the five who had been on it, the five who looked to Brother Juniper's shocked eyes like struggling ants falling to their doom those hundreds of feet below.

Even as he stood there frozen at the chapel door, the awesome thought swept through his brain that there had been no apparent reason for the tragedy. Why had that bridge that had endured for more than a hundred years, that had escaped lightning and tempest alike, why had it suddenly snapped on that day of calm with no unfriendly elements to threaten it? And why out of all Peru, out of the hundreds of persons who used that bridge day after day, why did it happen to those five and not to those who had just crossed or were about to cross?

Why those five?

The question burned in his mind, casting all peace from him, so that at last he went to the Convent in Lima and sought out the Abbess, a woman known for her quiet wisdom and her interest in everyone.

"The thought and memory of it will be with me always," he told her. "That is why I have knocked at your door, Mother Abbess. Here in Lima you know more of the lives of people than I do at San Luis Rey."

The Abbess looked at him with troubled eyes; for among those five were two who had been very dear to her. But when she spoke her voice was calm and resigned.

"The tangled skein of human lives requires a greater wisdom than ours," she said quietly.

"But if there were any plan in the universe at all," Brother Juniper said earnestly. "Any pattern, surely there would be some clue in the lives of those five cut off so suddenly. Either we live by accident and die by accident, or there is a great plan that encompasses us all."

"Should we question the mind of God?" There was a hint of reproach in her voice. "And can we ever know the hidden things in the hearts of men?"

"You will help me," he begged.

"I know something of two whose lives touched those who crossed on the bridge," she said reluctantly. "Years ago a basket was left on our doorstep. In it were twin babies and we named them Manuel and Esteban. They were unlike any boys I have ever known. I marvelled

"I love you, dear Manuel. Come home soon, to your own Micaela." She dictated the letter so eagerly. Estaban took it down, but he resented her love for his brother.

"Our rehearsals have frayed her nerves to the breaking point," Uncle Pio explained to the anxious Viceroy. But the wise Pio wasn't fooled for a moment by Micaela's little fainting spell.

"If you were to kill me," the Viceroy told Manuel, "you might marry la Villegas, and then make her the most miserable of women. Why not let well enough alone, Captain?"

Lynn Bari, with the costume and make-up she wears as Michaela (the "Perichole") in "The Bridge of San Luis Rey."

at the close bond between them. As they grew up they were educated as scribes, but when they left us I knew that Manuel would never be content to remain a scribe but Esteban was more studious. Beyond that I know little. Of things in the world, others can tell you better than I, perhaps Don Pio Banoza."

Everyone in Lima knew Uncle Pio. Even the friar had heard of him back there in the secluded Chapel at San Luis Rey. He was a man of many talents but he preferred to live by his wits and everyone thought of him as a rascal, except one, the woman young enough to be his daughter. But Brother Juniper did not know the part she had played in Uncle Pio's life that day he sought him out and questioned him.

"Do you know of Manuel and Esteban?" he asked.

A flash of annoyance crossed Uncle Pio's face.

"Always thorns in my flesh," he muttered. "Manuel in love with Micaela and Esteban hating her."

"Micaela Villegas?" The friar looked puzzled; for even in Spain he had heard of her, the woman who was called the Perichole because she was half Indian, the actress who in spite of her humble birth had become Lima's idol.

"Yes," Uncle Pio nodded. "The lives of those on the bridge were strangely entangled with the beautiful Micaela Villegas."

"And your life, too?" Brother Juniper hazarded the guess.

"She was my life," Uncle Pio said simply.

Then as he talked, and as the others the friar sought out talked, the pattern began to take shape—and always it was Micaela who was the central motif of that pattern.

She was beautiful, but more than that she was vivid. Even when she was little more than a child singing in the streets for the coins flung to her there was nothing of the commonplace about her. Even then she was an actress and that corner of the plaza where she sang was her own little theatre, the pavement her stage, her roof the sky. And Uncle Pio saw in this orphaned girl what he had always dreamed of finding some day, a Galatea to whom he could play Pygmalion.

So he dreamed, even in the years she still kept singing there in the plaza. So he taught her, so he nagged, driving her on with his ambition, teaching her, as even no impresario could, all the things he knew. The things that one day would be translated into her own greatness. And so he fumed, too, sometimes when he saw Manuel standing there, just staring at her, his adoring eyes betraying his heart, he knew that they had long loved each other, these two.

Esteban knew that, too, and jealousy drove him into hatred of this girl who was taking his brother away from him. But it eased the pain of parting when Manuel announced he was sailing to Spain as mate on the galleon Esperanza; for it would mean there would be no more stolen moments when Manuel and Micaela were together.

Uncle Pio breathed easier as well. With Manuel gone he would have things his own way. And it was as he thought. In scarcely any time at all Micaela was given a minor role in the theatre, and then more and more important ones, until at last she became the darling of all Lima.

It was the happiest time of Uncle Pio's life. He was determined to lift her to the heights and so he became her instructor, singing master, coiffeur, reader, prompter, voice coach, errand boy, her maid and her banker—in fact all but that which he would have wanted most of all to be, her father. Sometimes he praised her performance but always there was criticism, too, no matter how flawless it had been, for he was determined that she should not grow complacent.

It was Manuel, coming in through her window. "I have come to take you out of all this," he said tenderly. "If you will go with me."

Uncle Pio was quite a match for the Viceroy, directing the conversation about la Villegas with polite cleverness, unmistakable subtlety.

Then came the greatest triumph of all, when the Viceroy who had come night after night to the theatre and sat there staring at her, invited her to be his guest at the palace the night of the fiesta. Infatuated beyond reasoning, he had sent Don Gonzola, the governor of the palace, with the message because he trusted no one else with it. And Micaela didn't realize that she incurred the noble Don's undying enmity by the casual way she received him. For Don Gonzola was a proud man and it had been hard enough to have been sent like a common messenger without being treated like one.

Uncle Pio himself designed the dress she was to wear and stood over the dressmaker as she made it so that it would be everything he wanted. And on the afternoon of the great night itself, he himself ironed the ruffled petticoat she was to wear under it, for no one else could do things for her to his satisfaction.

"Little one," he called. Then as Micaela appeared on the balcony above he looked at her wonderingly. "Why does it take Esteban so long to copy the part?" he asked.

"He is nearly finished," Micaela said involuntarily, looking back at the room from which she had just come, the room where Esteban was supposed to be copying her new role. And she tried not to look too eager as she went back to him, for she knew Uncle Pio thought she had forgotten Manuel because she never spoke of him. But Esteban knew differently, Esteban who wrote down in his fine scholar's hand all those letters to Manuel which she dictated so eagerly, since she had never learned to write herself.

"Quick, quick!" She whispered, closing the door behind her. "Let's finish! But don't you dare tell him I'm writing a letter to Manuel."

"Every scribe takes a public oath never to betray the confidence of a client," Esteban said stiffly.

"Write this," Micaela said. And Esteban couldn't bear to look at her with her eyes shining in that eager, shameless way. " 'I pray that you are safe, dear Manuel, and that you will come home before the season of the storms. I love you.' " Then as Esteban sat there uncertainly she turned on him relentlessly, for she knew in her heart he was her enemy. "Did you put that down?" she demanded.

"Yes," he muttered bitterly. "You've said that in the letter three times."

"Well say it again," she cried. "I want him to know I mean it. And say," she was deliberately taunting him now, "say: 'You are unkind, Manuel, to remain away so long and leave behind an image of you that never comes to life. Come home soon, Manuel, to your own Micaela. I love you. I love you. I love you!' "

Esteban wrote the words down. Then suddenly a strange light came in his eyes and his head lifted as if he were listening to someone.

"What is it Esteban?" Micaela asked sharply. But he didn't answer. Shutting the letter in his small portfolio, he took his hat and rushed away.

It had happened again, as it had happened so often. A message had come to him from Manuel. He couldn't hold back his eagerness as he hurried to the Inn and ordered dinner—a very special dinner for two—and Doña Mercedes, the Innkeeper's wife, couldn't help that quick exclamation.

"Bless me!" she cried. "Those are the favorite dishes of Manuel and he is far away at sea."

"Tonight he will be with me," Esteban said. And even before he had finished speaking that shout went up in the street outside.

"A ship is coming into the harbor," someone called. And there was an eager babble of voices, for those were the days when ocean journeys were perilous and uncertain, when the coming of any ship was an occasion for prayer and thanksgiving.

It was Manuel's ship and Doña Mercedes never got over the shock of it, even those years later when she told the story to Brother Juniper.

"It was uncanny!" she said. "It haunted me. Those twins! The living ghost of one always whispering to the other!"

But that night there was bitterness in Esteban's happiness, for after that first joyous greeting Manuel seemed distraught, his thoughts far away, and Esteban knew it was because his brother could hardly bear the waiting time until Micaela's performance at the theatre would be over and he could go to her.

The Viceroy's carriage was already there waiting for her and Manuel frowned as he saw it. But that was forgotten when the door of her dressing room opened and she stood there, even more (Continued on page 79)

"Ready!" called Micaela, laughing happily, about to toss the ball down to the Viceroy. And he was enjoying it, too. But did he love the girl?

"Oh, I wish I'd never known you! You poison my whole life! Anyway, I shall be crazy soon, then it won't matter!"

Brother Juniper recorded the story of the bridge, as it was told him. And he asked questions no one could answer.

"The plaza is packed with people," Manuel told her. "The fiesta! Everybody is there! Music! Dancing! Come along. You can go to the palace another night."

"Charming gown," observed the Viceroy, commenting on her unusual attire. "Is it a new style? By the way, I've come to make amends for the unfortunate behavior of some of my guests last night. I apologize for them, and suggest you try to ignore them."

"All my life men have been telling me what to do. And now you!" Micaela was angry at the Viceroy, challenging him.

Gene and his own autographed, made-to-order git-tar, and he knows how to twang a mighty sweet tune out of it, as you know.

He's Proud to be SGT. AUTRY

BY

DOROTHY DEERE

When fire burned down Gene's home, his playhouse, where he also has his office, was spared. Here's Gene behind his redwood desk. In the picture on the wall (at farthest right) is Mrs. Autry, who was his boyhood sweetheart, a former schoolmarm.

Gene shows Dorothy Deere, our author, just one of the hundreds of thousands of gifts he's been given by fans, a Texas longhorn.

IN Hollywood, which raises ego-maniacs as well as citrus fruit, it is not the custom for a person to arrive wearing a normal size hat and after a successful sojourn, depart wearing a smaller one.

Gene Autry came into movietown in a ten-gallon Stetson with a brim wide enough to carry a spare troupe of Singer Midgets. He stayed eight years—five of those years fabulous with fame and riches—and when he left he went voluntarily, quietly and quickly. This time he was wearing the small-visored cap of a U. S. Army non-com.

Gene Autry could have had a commission. He was over draft age and could have stayed home. He went into service as a technical Sergeant, and it will be the proudest day of his life when he wins his wings as a pilot in the Ferry Command.

After a year in service, the Sarge admits that if he had known just what lay ahead of him when he enlisted, he might have been "scared to try it." Then, with a grin, he admits he would have joined up anyhow, since he would have been "scared to stay out." Since Gene has never been known as a scared guy, I asked him "how come."

Gene was a well established Chicago radio star, when he accepted a bid from a small and struggling studio to make his first picture. Its name, although a lot of people had never heard of it then, was Republic. With no major stars on its roster, and no elaborate settings within its budget's limits, it was best equipped to make Westerns.

The miracle of sound, however, had come to the screen at that time, and smart dialogue and band music was on the upswing. The horse op'ry was on the decline.

But out from the East rode young Autry, totin' his trusty git-tar, and ready and willin' to take a chance. He was strong, but he wasn't silent. He had a plaintive tenor, a lazy but friendly drawl, and a quick smile that scudded across the wide open spaces of his close-ups like the sun breaking through a smoke-filled fifth reel.

Here he is, Gene, the cowboy king, photographed for the first time in his sergeant's uniform. He says it will be the proudest day of his life when he wins his wings in the Ferry Command.

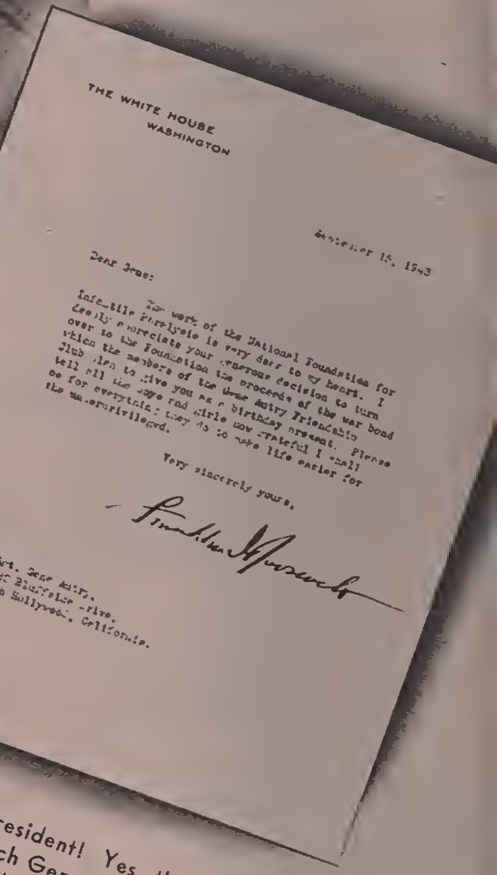
The only mementos Gene saved from the fire, when his house burned, were those in the playhouse—like these framed songs that he's made famous (and which he uses here as a decorative frieze around the room). Eight years in Hollywood brought him stardom and fame, but nothing to compare with the thrill he's getting out of serving in the U. S. Air Force. His fans aren't forgetting him, either. No, sir!



THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

September 15, 1943

Dear Gene:

The work of the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis is very dear to my heart. I deeply appreciate your generous decision to turn over to the Foundation the proceeds of the war bond which the members of the Gene Autry Friendship Club plan to give you as a birthday present. Please tell all the boys and girls how grateful I shall be for everything they do to make life easier for the underprivileged.

Very sincerely yours,

Franklin D Roosevelt

S/Sgt. Gene Autry,
[illegible] Bluffside Drive,
North Hollywood, California.

A letter from the President! Yes, there was one gift from his fans which Gene didn't keep for himself, but gave to President Roosevelt for his Warm Springs Foundation. It was a very high-figured War Bond, and this was the letter saying thanks Republic, the little unknown, gave him the lead in a serial, "The Phantom Empire." When his first picture was done, Gene took a quick look at himself on the screen and started to pack his bags.

"I thought I was so bad," he remembers, "that if there was any further shootin' it was goin' to be at Autry!"

The public, on the other hand, had decided Gene was just what was needed to take the tired formula of "a ride, a rope and a rescue" out of the doldrums.

Within a year, Gene and his git-tar had just about lifted the mortgage on the old home-studio, and for the next five years Gene Autry was Public Cowboy Number One, with a boxoffice rating right at the top. His pictures played in a larger number of theatres and broke more attendance records than those of any other star. His phonograph records still outsell those of any other singer in the country, male or female.

Most Hollywoodians have never seen Gene on the screen, and only a few of them know him in person. For that reason it came as a shock to the sex-appeal circles when the news got 'round that the Rhythm Ranger was drawing more fan mail than any mere glamour boy in the business. Living quietly with his wife in his San Fernando Valley home, spending most of his playtime at his ranch rather than in the cafe's diamond horseshoes, it is news today to most Cinema Citizens to learn that an entire town of 7,000 in Ohio depends entirely for its living on the manufacture of Gene Autry cap pistols, and that a glider base in Texas is named the Gene Autry Field.

All of which adds up to the reason why, when a war came along, Gene didn't have much of a struggle within himself. More than any other star, with the exception of Gable perhaps, he knows exactly why he traded in his expensive Stetson for a service cap.

Home on furlough, the Sergeant sat in the trophy-hung den of the home his fans helped him to buy, and told me about it:

"I got to thinkin' of how I was goin' to explain it to the kids if I didn't get in," says he. "My pictures aren't just like the other stars'. Here was I, always the outdoor fellow, always in the middle of every scrap, always on the side of law and order. Accordin' to what I've been givin' those kids on the screen, I couldn't stay out of this one. I could hear millions of youngsters sayin' to themselves, 'If Gene Autry'd get in, this war would be over in a hurry!' "

Gene talking is somehow reminiscent of Will Rogers. Lean and fit from his months in (Continued on page 73)

BRIGHTEST STAR of the NURSERY SET

Margaret O'Brien, the baby Bernhardt. Though she can't read her own scripts yet (Mama does that for her), she needs no help when in front of the camera.

MADAME CURIE
A BIOGRAPHY BY EVE CURIE

Tricks distinguished performers have spent years mastering, Margaret does with effortless ease. She's with Greer Garsan in "Madame Curie," and Greer says the child wonder stole every scene they had together.

She was Margaret in "Journey for Morgoret," the angel of "Last Angel." Here she's a six-year-old Miss Femininity, an admiring audience for Walter Pidgeon, who's telling her a fairy story.

Ain't it the truth? In Hollywood, alas, no matter how young a girl is, there's always one younger. Margaret's rival is little "Gigi" (latest child acting find)—but fortunately they adore one another.

Movieland's Five Best Pictures of the Month

"MADAME CURIE"

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

NO other actress on the screen today could have filled the role of Marie Curie quite as perfectly as Greer Garson. Nor could there have been an improvement upon the portrait Walter Pidgeon presents of Pierre Curie, her husband and collaborator in the discovery of radium. They play an exquisite and absorbing love drama, enormously gratifying in its tasteful dignity of depicting the intimacies of a great love and union of intellects. "Madame Curie" is an unforgettable motion picture.

The film is based on a book Eve Curie wrote about her mother. Marie is described as a frail, stubborn, eager woman, and we first meet her as a young honor student at the Sorbonne, Paris. Befriended by her elderly professor, she gains the opportunity of doing research in the laboratory of Pierre Curie, an unworldly scientist who is shocked by the thought that this new colleague is a girl. Within a short time, she has made herself indispensable, so much so that Pierre is driven to proposing marriage when Marie prepares to return to her parents in Poland.

The proposal is a charming incident. On their honeymoon trip Marie thinks of a laboratory phenomenon she once witnessed which seemed to indicate an unknown active element in pitchblende. She doesn't understand it, and whatever Marie didn't understand disturbed her. It was her tenacity and her husband's skill that led to the discovery of radium.

Sensitive performances by the stars are matched by uniformly excellent supporting characterizations, headed by those of Albert Basserman, Robert Walker, Henry Travers and many others. This is one of those rare screen treats you will not dare miss.

"HAPPY LAND"

(20th Century-Fox)

WHEN Lew Marsh, a small-town druggist in Iowa, received word that his only son had been killed in action, he was so grief-stricken that he felt nothing was left in life now Rusty was gone. Then the spirit of his grandfather, a veteran of the Civil War, materialized for Lew. Together they strolled through town recalling and reliving events of the past twenty-five years from the time that Lew returned from World War I. They saw Rusty grow up to be a credit to his American heritage, and they remembered some of the little things about his happy childhood which caused him to want to go to World War II to protect those things for other American children. Thus before Gramp departed to go back up there, Lew found the grief softened by pride in his son.

No motion picture has more comprehensively presented the America all men in the armed services are fighting for. "Happy Land," from the novel by MacKinlay Kantor, is inspiring, simple and glorious. It is a beautiful reavowal of treasured American memories for our men overseas, and at the same time, the perfect home-front picture for their families in this country. It will surely bring solace for the comfort of audiences worlds apart. Besides, it's good entertainment; a relief from the grimmer war realism.

Don Ameche gives the performance of his life as Lew Marsh, Harry Carey is priceless as Gramp, and Frances Dee charming as Rusty's mother. Rusty, himself, is splendidly portrayed by Richard Crane as the grown-up boy, and by James West and Larry Olsen as the 'teen age and the five-year-old. Yet one of the finest notes of all is sounded by Henry Morgan as Tony, Rusty's orphaned shipmate returned from the Pacific.

"LOST ANGEL"

(Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer)

THIS is a tender, heart-warming entertainment which dips so delightfully into pure sentiment that it is a joy to behold. The "Lost Angel" of the title is a tiny six-year-old foundling girl who has been scientifically reared by a group of experimenting professors. She has been schooled in subjects far in advance of her age—mathematics, history and even Chinese which is one of the several languages she speaks fluently.

At six, her I.Q. stands at genius, but there are some things she finds she hasn't learned about. A newspaper reporter interviews her and chats, as he would with any ordinary youngster, about magic and fairy tales. Her imagination, the one faculty neglected in her exhaustive education, is stimulated, and as a result she sets out by herself to investigate the enchantments described. Her experiences lead to discovery of the greatest of all magic—the love for a fellow human being.

Margaret O'Brien, actually six years old, the age of Alpha, the little girl she portrays, will be remembered for her debut in "Journey for Margaret." She is an amazing dramatic figure and her natural abilities transcend acting. Her talents demonstrate a magic equal to that which Alpha wanted to investigate.

She needs no "child actor" advantage, to be rated a star. Her performances stand on their own merit.

James Craig is mighty good as the newspaper man, and Marsha Hunt very lovely as the girl to whom he is engaged. Keenan Wynn, son of Ed Wynn, the stage comedian, makes an outstanding impression with a gangster he plays for a solid hit. Others in the cast are excellent under the direction of Roy Rowland, a newcomer with a great deal to offer.

"NO TIME FOR LOVE"

(Paramount)

SMART-SET farce brings together Claudette Colbert and Fred MacMurray for another of their riotous film romances. She enacts a society photographer, and he a sandhog, one of those workmen who toil dangerously in a tunnel that is being dug beneath a river. She is assigned by the pictorial magazine for which she works to make camera studies of the tunnel project, but the presence of a woman is resented by the sandhogs on the job, something about an old superstition that women bring bad luck underground. Possibly she does, for Fred is injured.

He recovers sufficiently in the low compression chamber to start a fight with a couple of buddies, merely a friendly brawl but it doesn't look so good in the photo she snaps. Its publication causes Fred to be suspended, and Claudette, wishing to compensate him for an enforced layoff, gives him work carrying around her photographic equipment. Besides she wants to continue to see him until she can stop dreaming of him as Superman. From that situation, the scrappy romance builds.

Claudette takes a lot of physical punishment with her usual display of grand sportsmanship. She really gets smeared by the mud and mire in the tunnel. MacMurray punches across a two-fisted mugg character that stacks up with his best work. Ilka Chase, Richard Haydn and June Havoc add to the gaiety in supporting roles.

Now all of this is not as funny as it might have been had you been allowed to see it when it was filmed a year and a half ago. The comedy poses a problem in social consciousness which no longer exists in a world at war. To prove how dated "No Time for Love" has become, just count the number of eating scenes, pointed but not rationed.

"HIGHER AND HIGHER"

(RKO-Radio)

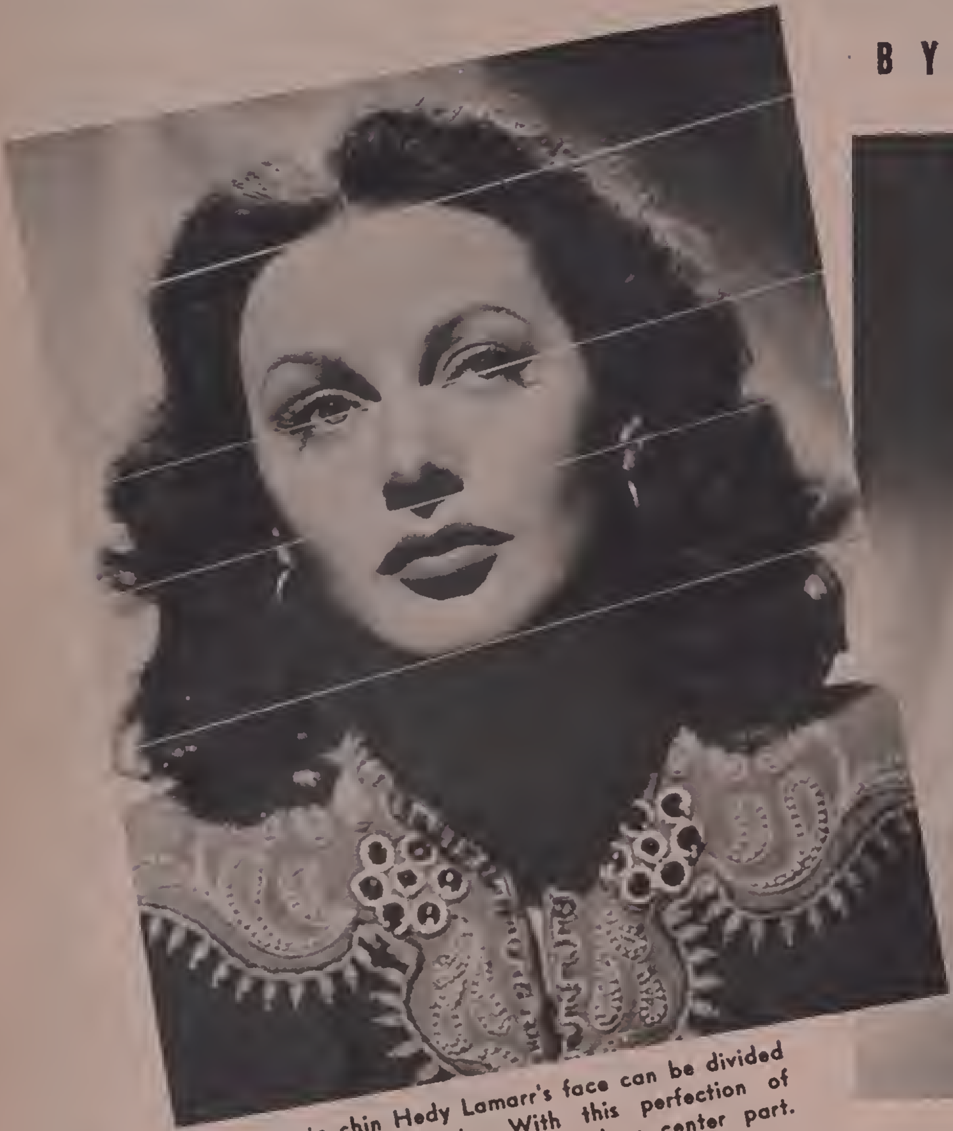
HEY, kids! Here he is—the one and only Frank Sinatra in his first starring screen appearance. The swooner-crooner had a bit in one previous Hollywood movie, a little something called "Reveille with Beverly," in which he strolled in long enough to sing "Night and Day." But that was before he clicked and for his song he was paid only a few hundred dollars. In "Higher and Higher," Frank has a full-fledged role (he plays himself) and just to show how his stock has soared, the studio added a couple of 00 to his salary. As a matter of fact, he proves worth whatever he was paid, for without Sinatra this musical might have been a waste of time. It certainly wouldn't have rated among the top five pictures of the month.

Despite his tremendous success, Frank has remained a modest and fairly retiring chap. The camera captures his shyness and gives him to his fans as a regular guy to whom fame just happened to happen. It doesn't seem to have turned his head, and there's no noticeable change to the unique appeal of his voice that does tricks when he makes with the crooning. You cannot describe Sinatra's style anymore than you can spell that sound his followers utter when he hits a person-to-person note.

"Higher and Higher" was once a Broadway musical comedy. Frank's role of the fellow who lives next door has simply been added to the original lightweight plot about a group of servants who form a corporation to promote a scullery maid into a glamour girl—object: her matrimony and the possibility of collecting their back salaries. Michele Morgan is miscast as the maid, and Jack Haley repeats his stage part as the promoter. But there's always Sinatra!

MOVIELAND'S Beauty Hints

BY MARIAN LONGACRE



From brow to chin Hedy Lamarr's face can be divided into three parallel parts. With this perfection of features, her hair can be worn with a center part.

From any angle, Hedy's face is symmetrically beautiful. Lacking this unusual regularity, however, most faces appear to better advantage when the hair is worn in a side-part coiffure. So say the experts.

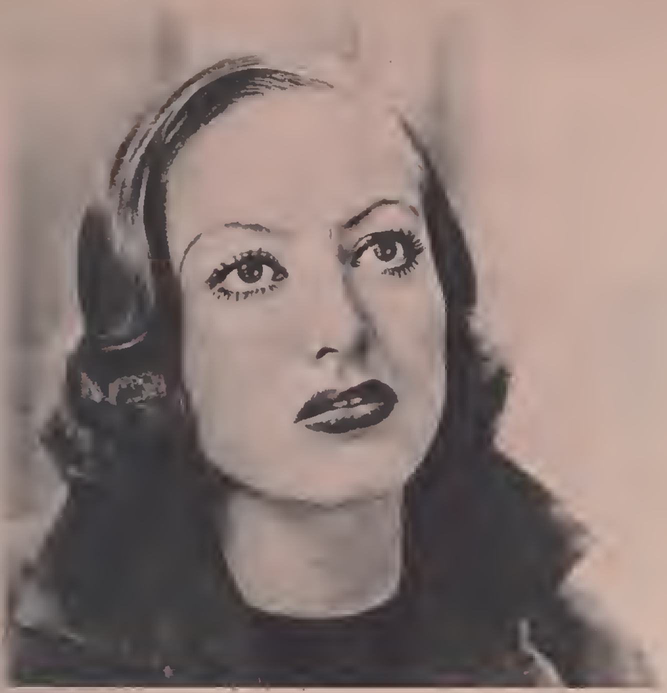
TALK—just laugh and talk and be natural sitting in front of the mirror. Then you are seeing the same effect that you are giving other people. This is the advice of Jack Dawn, MGM's makeup wizard. Study your facial expressions in action. You'll apply cosmetics to show good points and diminish beauty weaknesses. This is particularly true when applying lipstick. Make up your mouth so that it is symmetrical when you are speaking. Remember, people almost never see your mouth in repose. (Not unless you're an awfully dull girl.)

NINETY-NINE percent of the women look better wearing paste rouge rather than cake rouge (Jack Dawn says this, too). Paste rouge is generally more easily blended into the skin and gives a more natural glow to the cheeks. If you just can't help but apply paste rouge unevenly, use dry rouge—but be sure to blend the edges into the pigment. The old fashion of pink tipped ears and rouge tone under the brows is out! For picture makeup, they sometimes add a touch of rouge to the chin for a youthful healthy look, but it's dangerous business; really, unless you are very subtle.

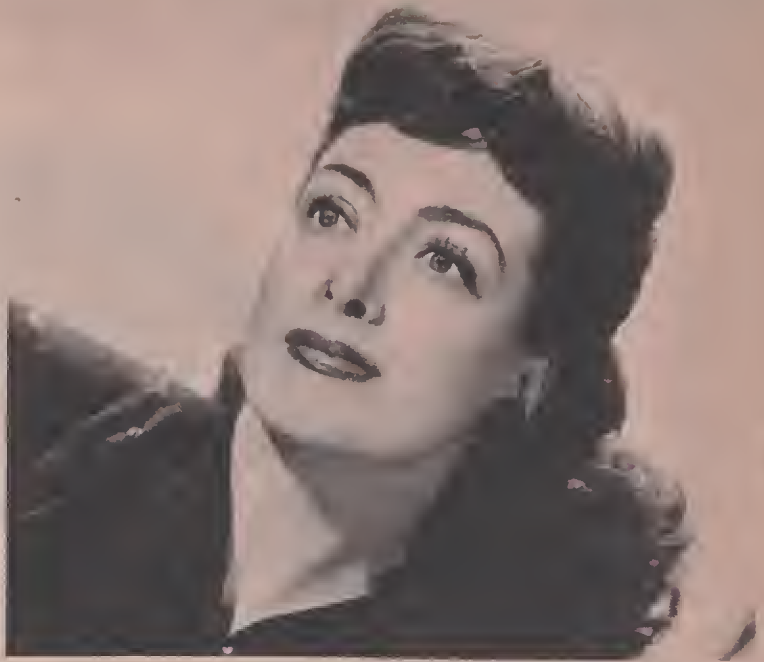
CORRECTION—is the fundamental reason for wearing makeup. If your lips are thin widen them with lipstick drawn finely beyond the natural line. If your eyes are small extend the corners with a light touch of the brow pencil, using a double line. Covering blemishes with powder base and balancing eye disfigurements with eyeshadow are priceless tricks. Experiment carefully at home before an application habit is formed.

SPEND TIME—on your face. Really study it. (Other people do.) A beauty conscious woman should test effects of cosmetics on her own skin, studying the contours of her face and the bone structure of her head. If your face is over-long or over-round, don't accept set rules but try several cosmetic colors and placements until the most flattering result is found. You are your best judge, for no one knows so well your facial shortcomings nor is anyone as interested as you are to cause a prettier you.

JOAN CRAWFORD—was the first actress in Hollywood to extend lipstick beyond the natural line of



The extended mouthline, introduced in 1931 by Joan Crawford (as "Letty Lynton"), was a sensation. According to current taste of good grooming, it looks very extreme and overdone.



Today Joan Crawford is a more beautiful woman because her makeup is rational and has the feminine freshness of natural charm. She has a sweeter, softer look, cleverly emphasized by correct makeup.

Greer Garson, considered an outstanding example of patrician type beauty. Note how her upper eyelids parallel the same graceful contour as her two brows.

Jack Dawn, head of the makeup department at MGM, on the job in his laboratory. Before applying makeup to any of the stars, he always starts by making a plaster mask of the face, studying the contours.

her mouth to give her lips a full-look. It has since become the vogue and is known as "the Hollywood mouth." This is a neat worthwhile trick, but Jack Dawn of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer insists that overdoing the job is a common fault. Even studio makeup men, whose business is makeup, emphasize the fact that a natural look is imperative to good looks.

FOR FUN—see if your face is equally divided into three parts (like Caesar's Rome). Top of brow to center of eyes, center of eyes to base of nose, base of nose to under the chin, all should be equal. That is the standard of good facial proportion. Hedy Lamarr measures by this standard to perfection. If you don't, use your makeup or your hairdo as a means of creating this effect.

UP, UP—on the lines of your face. When penciling the brows give an upward sweep at the ends. When painting your lips blend the corners of your mouth up. All upward lines add youth to your face. As time goes by your face tends to sag by nature, so to thwart time apply all makeup upward.

MARLENE DIETRICH—will wear gold painted legs for a scene in "Kismet," her forthcoming picture with Ronald Colman. A plastic liquid has been found that will wear well and resist water. From it we may hope for more durable leg makeup that might last for a week, and could come in beige or skin tone colors besides bright shades to match costumes. Jack Dawn is working on all this.

NIGHT AND DAY—makeup must vary. A light textured, sparsely applied glow is proper for street wear. For evening heavier applied cosmetics are more flattering. As for day or night shades of powder, rouge or lipstick, choose colors which most improve your personal looks according to natural coloring.

EYEBROW—line should follow the shape of the upper eyelid. The eyelid indicates the most becoming line of the brow and should coincide. Greer Garson is a perfect example, for her arched brows make a parallel curve with her eyelashes. For sparse growth of eyebrows fill in with faint penciling and avoid freakish angles and harsh lines.

DIARY OF A MOVIE STAR FATHER (Brian Donlevy)

A year ago Movieland published Brian Donlevy's "Diary of an Expectant Father." Here's the continuation of that life story, concerning a perfect baby girl

TO HIS BABY DAUGHTER (Judith Ann)

FEBRUARY 20, 1943.

You're being born, baby, but I don't know yet whether you're Judith or Joe, and your Daddy's a nervous wreck and beginning to think you'll never get here!

Right now I'm sitting in the basement of the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital in Hollywood, and you're coming into the world a few floors above me. And I'm stone sober (which I never planned on for this occasion!), and your grandmother's sitting a few feet away, and I can't read, or think, or do anything but wait for you and write this. But just so you won't wonder why your old man's hiding in the cellar here, let me explain:

The waiting room upstairs on the maternity floor is just jammed with guys waiting for the same thing I am—jammed, and hot and noisy, and everyone's quarreling, and sooner or later there had to be a last straw. This was it: a huge, tough, 250-pounder of a guy was stalking the floor there for hours. Finally a nurse put her nose in the door and said to him, "Congratulations. Mr. Stone. You're the father of a three and a half pound son." Well, you should have seen that gorilla of a guy! His face grew lobster red with rage, his chest swelled out a foot, and he howls, "Three and a half pounds! Why, my wife's bigger'n I am!" So with that he runs furiously to the door, swings on the sill and yowls, "What a hospital this is!" And bang! He's gone.

That did it. I hurried down to the basement for peace and quiet, and here I sit, jittering, squirming and waiting. I'll write in this thing again when I can tell you a little more about yourself.

Same day—6 a.m.

My darling little Judith Ann, I haven't seen you yet, but I know you're here—and I want to be the first to tell you how happy I am. Always I wanted you to be a baby girl, and here you are—eight pounds worth! (If only I knew that frustrated Mr. Stone's number, I'd call him just to gloat!)

But right now I'm too tired to gloat. I peeked in at your mother, drove your grandmother home, and now I'm sitting in the silent, empty house, writing you. Outside my window the birds are getting up for the day, and pretty loud about it, too. But I'm going to bed—a very unshaven, tired, happy guy who has a tiny hunk of daughter he hasn't seen yet. Goodnight, Judith Ann.

March 16, 1943.

You've been home with your family for two weeks now, and oh, brother! How eight pounds of you has changed two hundred pounds of me! I have deserted my big and comfortable bedroom-sitting room-dressing room next to your room, and am slumbering on a cot out in the garage! This is because you cry a lot at night, not knowing that your dad has to sleep nights and get up at dawn to work in pictures—the current one being a swell one called "America." A title that means plenty!

Lookit! She's just a wee tot, and yet Judith Ann Donlevy finds the world all upside down. Oh, baby!

But maybe, since you're a stranger here, I'd better tell you about your piece of the real America. It's two acres big, and it's sort of a pint-sized edition of the estates of olden times—we've got nearly everything to live on right here. When your mother and I first came here four years ago, there was just a square white wooden house on a fenced-in lot. Now we've got a complete carpenter's shop (and I keep it full of sawdust, too), a chicken coop full of chickens, a big woodshed stuffed with twelve cords of logs and kindling wood. Your orange juice comes from our citrus orchard, and your vegetables from our big Victory Garden. Doesn't sound much like Hollywood, you'll find out—sounds more like the Middle West, where both your mother and I came from.

The house isn't square any more, either—it's got two new rooms hanging on it, and one new bath. The Donlevy family practically lives in one of the new rooms—the den downstairs where you have breakfast, the one with the stone fireplace, and all the big couches, and the sun pouring in. The room in which you spend half your waking hours.

You spend your sleeping hours in the other new room—with the crib and the blue linoleum floor. And you want to know who put every nail and board in it? Nobody but your old man! Same way with your bathroom. I built it on the house— and when the plumbers put all the permanent white furniture in it, guess who was gawking over their shoulders the whole time, just so he'd know how to fix anything that broke?

Yes, Judy, it's high time you learned about your world—and your parents. Your mother's the pretty girl with the red hair who always looks as if she just climbed out of a fashion magazine. And the hired man is not the guy with the sunburn and the faded overalls you see puttering around the place Sundays, with nails in his mouth and a blister on his thumb. That, my dear lady, is nobody else but me! Who can't wait until you're old enough to hold the paint bucket for him—or till you can hop on the back of his motorcycle for a spin!

May 20, 1943.

You're three months old today—and do you know how often I've met you so far? Thirteen times! And here you are my favorite person in all the world, after that red-headed girl I've mentioned before.

The fault lies with my working so early and getting home so late. I only see you Sundays. Oh, I see signs of you around the house evenings—I bump into your clothes on the line when I come in from the garage, and every night I tiptoe in to see the top of your sleeping head. (Just between us, though, I really like best the gold spoon I brought you at the hospital and shoved in your mouth—to start you off in life with better luck than I had!)

But, baby, this casual acquaintance of ours is bad. I'm lonely for you. Either you'll have to quit sleeping or I'll have to quit working. This is a terrible life we're leading now, apart!

July 12, 1943.

Mostly when I'm thinking about you, I think about the questions you'll ask and (Continued on page 88)

ANOTHER STRANGEST PROPOSAL

The second yarn is just as cute.

When Martha O'Driscoll was thirteen, she had her first date. She considered it the most important occasion of her life. She not only was wearing her first grown-up dress, but her swain of the evening was handsome Dick Adams. They went to the movies and had a soda, and when Dick left her at the door, they both had realized they were made for each other.

Dick Adams went to Annapolis and so has been in the war since it started. On his last liberty, he and Martha drove out along the ocean in his duration jalopy. He stopped the car and took a small package from his pocket.

"See this?" The moonlight fell on a plastic ring. In the center was carved a bachelor button, framed on each side by a sweetheart rose.

"So?" said Martha.

Lt. Commander Adams cleared his throat and took a deep breath.

"Will you marry me so I can throw away the bachelor button?"

"Tsk," said Martha. "Of course."

Martha now sports a ring of marquise diamonds, surrounded by sapphires. Lt. Commander Richard Adams is out at sea on an aircraft carrier. In his pocket is a ring with two sweetheart roses, and a hole in the center.

LOOK OUT BELOW, CLAUDIA IS FLYING

Dorothy Maguire, who created the Claudia role on the stage and screen, is spending the winter with her husband, John Swope, in Phoenix, Arizona. Swope is a Civilian Air Instructor. To while away her time and be near him Dorothy is learning to fly, too. She says she has the worst time trying to make her instructors understand that she is not really Claudia and won't pull one of her scatterbrained tricks. They have yet to let her solo and she is sure that it is Claudia's fault.

GABLE, THE DRUGSTORE PATRIOT

Captain Clark Gable, now back in Hollywood, editing the films he shot on bombing missions over Germany, tells this story on himself.

A few miles from his Encino ranch, there is a small drug and candy store where he used to go for breakfast before he was in the Army. Returning home, and still needing breakfast, even though he wears a hero's medals, he headed for the same drug store. Man and womanpower being what it is these days, there was only one waitress on duty, a new girl, and she'd got Clark all the way through his ham and eggs before she recognized him. When she gasped out his name, he beat it out of there, and thought that was that.

But a week later, Clark got hungry on the way to town and decided to invade the drug store once again. In he went, only to discover one seat roped off with red, white and blue ribbons. On the seat itself was a small American flag in a standard. On the counter before all this was a neat sign, saying "Captain Clark Gable sat here."

Considerably embarrassed, Clark asked the waitress how she got away with it all.

She said, smiling proudly, "I let them as buys war stamps sit there."

SEE WHO'S TALKING

My favorite crack of the month comes from Walter Pidgeon. Pidge is nobody to get into a verbal duel with, as Frank Sinatra was to discover when he and Pidge, together with Danny Kaye and the music commentator, Deems Taylor, all happened to get off the same train together in Chicago.

The autograph fans swarmed all over Frankie, ignoring the other three men, who couldn't even force their way through the crowd. Frankie grinned back at Pidge, looming tall over him, and said, "Isn't it too bad you can't sing?"

Said Pidge, his voice purring, "Isn't it good you can?"

The wonderful part of it all is that Pidge can sing, magnificently. He's also a musical highbrow of the first water.

BACK TO THE OLD FOR SOMETHING NEW

Old fashioned box suppers are the newest, smartest party idea in movieland. Contests between the most glamorous actresses in town as to which can make the best potato salad and the lightest cakes are reminiscent, in this new-fashioned town, of old-fashioned novels. For example, the Walter Langs gave a "box supper" for their friends the other night. Guests were the Ray Millands, the George Murphys, the Fred MacMurrays, Ann Sothern, June Havoc, Virginia Bruce, Mary Livingston—and all in honor of Cesar Romero on his first leave home from the Coast Guard.

Imagine a box supper for the sophisticated Cesar! A number was pinned on each guest as they came in the door, another on the box they brought, and then the drawing started.

Ray Milland stood in the corner looking very glum. He was sure he was going to get a box filled with peanut butter sandwiches, his pet hate.

When the drawing started everyone waited to see which partner he or she would get. Prize for the best box went to June Havoc and her prize was a pink bed jacket. Second prize went to Lillian MacMurray, a plastic luncheon set.

Cesar juggled the drawing numbers so he could sit with his newest best girl, Virginia Bruce. Fieldsie Lang figured out that for the whole party only fifteen ration points had been used. Ingenious these movie hostesses!

IT SEEMS TO BE SERIOUS

Very, very secret have been the datings between Bonita Granville and the dashing Lt. John Carroll.

Nevertheless, it has reached the stage of mothers meeting mothers and Bonita racing to the airport to meet planes.

John is the aide to the general in charge of fighting planes and is always flying all over the country. When the planes come in, standing at Bonita's side, also waiting, is usually Edna Skelton, the ex-Mrs. Red, whose beau Lt. Donald Zepfel is the other aide to the general. Both girls lunch frequently and the couples meet at each other's houses.

Bonita and her mother save their ration points like mad so they can have a big roast ready when John comes flying in. John's aristocratic mother is very fond of "Bun."

Something might come of this, although Bonita has said that marriage is out for her for the duration.

WAR WORKS STRANGE WONDERS

The Humphrey Bogarts, now overseas, were preparing for the trip. Mayo Bogart talked long and seriously with Frances Langford, who had recently returned from North Africa and Sicily, as to what the well-dressed entertainer should wear. Frances told Mayo that you just didn't stand a chance to get your hair washed, even do it yourself, so to take lots of snoods along.

There is one thing that Bogey gets into a towering rage about, and that thing is women's snoods. So when he came home one night to find a half dozen lying on Mayo's dressing table, the house rang with screaming howling rage, but quieted down when Mayo explained. So Bogey, who has been known to actually turn green when he sees a snood, has now traveled in five countries with his wife gaily wearing said hair-holders. So you see!!!

like a cup filled with clear honey: sweet, golden, and bright with reflections.

Thus, just as Loretta grew up with the conviction that her mother was the most beautiful woman in the world, Judy is developing a similar belief—with extensions.

Colonel Tom Lewis, Judy and Loretta were at dinner one night when Judy rested her hand on her father's sleeve to interrupt something he was telling Loretta. "Just a moment, honey," he cautioned.

She waited. Under her breath she observed, "This is important."

Tom went on with his narrative, despite that small, insistent hand. Finally he turned. "All right, darling. What is it?"

"Am I pretty?"

He scanned the young lady's features. "Yes, I think you are a very nice looking little girl," he said judiciously.

This didn't quite satisfy the need. "Am I as pretty as Mommy?" she demanded.

"What you see in your mother's face that you admire is the light that comes from being happy and a fine person," he explained. "When you grow up, if you will remember to be as sweet and kind and gracious as your mother, I'm sure you will be as pretty as she is."

"Oh," said Judy, going to work conscientiously on her spinach.

What step-daddy Tom Lewis didn't explain to Judy was that things weren't always easy for her adopted mother. There were four of the Young girls, as you probably recall—Loretta, who was christened Gretchen; Sally, who called herself professionally Sally Blane, and who married Producer Harry Joe Brown and recently divorced him to marry Norman Foster; Polly Ann Young, who has been most happily married for years now; and Georgianna, the baby.

They were daughters of a broken marriage and they knew, even as babies, how valiantly their mother worked to support them, earning their meager income, at first, by running a boarding house.

Even as a very little girl, Loretta worked in pictures. She was such a beautiful child that Mae Murray, the star, wanted to adopt her—but Mrs. Young resisted that golden lure. She let Loretta visit Mae, but she kept their home together. At fourteen, Loretta was launched as a leading woman. The other two girls followed quickly in her glittering footsteps. Only Georgianna has never given a hoot about movies. She is as beautiful as her sisters, but she has made only one film, and that one employing all four of them, as a family unit.

They were always a family unit, the Youngs. And yet Loretta eloped, at seventeen. That was the romantic in her. She thought it was love. The man she chose was her leading man, Grant Withers. Yet actually, all this precocious child wanted was this defiance of home discipline, this showing the world that she could elope. She was completely unready for the discipline of marriage, and so, too, was Grant. They managed to stick it out for two years, and then they separated, with few hard feelings and even less regrets.

Loretta had gained one thing, however, from this silly escapade. She realized that there were deeper values to marriage, and she knew if she ever entered into another one, it would be for keeps. During the years before she met Tom Lewis, Loretta knew, despite her brilliant career, many lonely times. But she learned from the loneliness, just as she learned from the discipline of the studio. Acting was much more natural to her, for example, than always being on time, always being patient and cooperative, always being perfectly groomed. But just as she learned the fine technique of her profession, so she mastered these other lessons—until today she is one of the best dressed, most charming and most punctual women in existence.

Loretta Young grew up in a big family. She believes in big families and hopes to own and operate one herself some day. In a big family, discipline is relatively easy. Sharing is an established procedure, from necessity. Behavior follows a certain pattern or the rebel is razzed out of his attitude by other members of the family.

Out of all this Loretta came to the conclusion that when a child grows up alone, a parent has a double responsibility: that of adult guidance and contemporary criticism. Judy, luckily, has a small male cousin with whom she carries on Superman and Prince Valiant games. Boylike, he is still exercising the mountain goat instinct to climb roofs and incidental scaffolding. When Loretta caught him enticing Judy into a dangerous tight-pole walk along the patio arbor, she ordered them down at once.

The next day Judy tipped her head on one side and informed her mother, "Dickie doesn't like you. His mother will let him do anything he pleases, but you are always giving him orders and making him mind."

Loretta, taking this criticism seriously, sat down to talk the thing out with Judy. "When I go to the studio, I have to mind the producer and the director and the dialogue coach, and dozens of other people. I'm a grown woman, but I still have to take orders. Your daddy is a Lieutenant Colonel in the army, which is a very big job. He gives orders, but he also has to take orders from many, many people. You see, darling, the time to learn to do as you are told is when you are growing up. Most people have to take orders from someone all the days of their lives; the only way to be happy, doing as you are told, is to have learned the habit of obeying when you are small. Does that make sense, darling?"

"Well . . ." said Judy, obviously stymied by this flow of logic. However, the chat had results, because the next time Judy and Dickie were playing together, Judy gave her small cousin the benefit of Loretta's lecture.

Although Loretta used her studio experience as foundation for a coaching session, her actual picture work means little to Judy, who has never seen one of her mother's films.

"I don't want her to put on airs—not more than she is inclined to do naturally," Loretta confided. "When she asks me what I do at the studio I tell her I merely act. That I like to act. I explain that some mothers cook fancy foods. Some sew beautifully. Some work for the Red Cross or the Junior League or the Canteen. But I just act. Judy has heard all about those other activities from her school friends, so it all seems logical to her."

According to Loretta, part of the happiness of taking one's place between two generations lies in the opportunity one has to fulfill one's own childhood lacks.

For instance, Loretta was a slender child of twelve with freckles, wide green eyes and bands on her teeth when she was taken shopping for a new hat. She saw one that she liked, but her mother, usually indulgent in other things, had definite notions about headgear. "Heavens, you don't want that," she contradicted. "Here is a much nicer hat. It is a more practical color and it will wear a long time."

Loretta, her eyes still on the bonnet of her choice, tried on the other hat. Well, it was the proper size, but that was about all she could say for it. She didn't like the shape, nor the color, nor the sensible material. But she gave in to her mother's persuasion.

About hats, there is a great mystery. The one you adore gets blown off your head into a mud puddle and run over by a casual motorist. The one you hate goes through flood, cyclone, earthquake and fire, and never suffers the slightest damage.

So it was with Loretta's sensible, and deeply loathed, topper. She thought it would last forever. She believes, to this day, that it is packed away in a trunk, spruce and fresh, and ready to be resurrected by another generation.

When Loretta and Judy went hat shopping recently, Judy's taste singled out a fragile, rather inappropriate confection of flowers, chiffon and ribbon. "But, darling," Loretta started to say, "most of the little girls are wearing hats like this one over here. This sensible navy blue. Wouldn't that be better?"

Then the half-forgotten ghost of that personal childhood hat settled on her head. The crown pinched in remembrance. The brim cast a shadow of acute unhappy memory. "But if you really want that fancy hat," she amended quickly, "I'll be glad to buy it for you."

She will never forget the worshipful look lavished upon her by her gratified daughter.

It was the same general expression she receives from her husband after a particularly successful dinner party at which she has entertained his army friends, and the same general display of visual admiration she gets during an army camp tour when she is decorated with the accolade, "There goes a gosh-swell girl."

Titles like that have to be earned, and Loretta is the gal who can qualify. It's self-thinking that earns some stars their reputations for being aloof, egotistical, hard to get along with; it's Loretta's thinking of other people that makes her someone you'd really like to know.

NEW PICTURE GUIDE

THE GANG'S ALL HERE (20th Century-Fox) indulges in a wealth of undeniably beautiful dance routines which make stunning and tasteful patterns in Technicolor. Yet no one bothered to provide the picture with a story worthy of the camera magic. It is merely a trifle about a soldier who marches off to war leaving two girls believing themselves engaged to him. Naturally, this being a movie, the girls meet and one courageously hides her heartbreak because her man has apparently played her false.

Alice Faye is this young lady, a chorus girl on her way to stardom. She is provided with a hit tune, "No Love, No Nothing," in lieu of a role which differs not at all from the kind she has played in a dozen other musicals. James Ellison as the soldier and Sheila Ryan as the second sweetheart don't mean much, except that Sheila surprises even herself by dancing with Tony De Marco. Carmen Miranda gets some laughs by mixing up the English language, Benny Goodman and band do justice to the good music, but Phil Baker, fresh from radio, has a part that never does get to the $64 question.

GANGWAY FOR TOMORROW (RKO) goes "Grand Hotel" one better by spinning the yarns of six war-workers who are sharing a ride to an airplane factory. Their driver has imagined what his riders did before the war and what walks of life they came from. As he tells of how he read their characters, the actual stories of their lives flash across their minds. Among them are a refugee girl from Paris, the warden of a penitentiary, an ex-hobo, an auto speedway racer and a one-time winner of the Miss America contest. Margo, John Carradine and Robert Ryan fare best in the roles assigned them, yet a novelty theme of this calibre should have been more importantly cast.

ROGER TOUHY, LAST OF THE GANGSTERS (20th Century-Fox) tells us again, in no unmistakable terms, that crime does not pay. Not for several years has Hollywood turned attention to gangster practices so familiar in the days when Cagney, Robinson, Bogart and company made entertaining faces at the law. But their films were not acceptable for export to foreign countries, so Hollywood quit making crime melodramas which might be misunderstood when shown overseas. "Roger Touhy, Last of the Gangsters," however, is solely for American consumption, so punches aren't pulled in depicting the final exploits of the former Capone mobster who is now serving a term of 99 years in prison, all because the FBI got after him after ironically being given jurisdiction of the case because the gang had forgotten to register in the draft.

In the exciting action on a big-time scale, Preston Foster plays Touhy, and Victor McLaglen is his second in command, a formidable character named Owl Banghart, once a school teacher, who forever corrects grammatical lapses of his lawless associates. Kent Taylor, Anthony Quinn, Henry Morgan and a number of muggs you haven't seen very often since hoodlums went out of style are in the cast. There's a jail break and a climaxing capture for swell thrill stuff.

SWING FEVER (MGM) fails to allow Kay Kyser to run much of a temperature and gets nowhere fast. The band leader appears as a guy who has an "evil eye" which immobilizes anyone he glares at. It is a stunt a crooked prizefight manager thinks will be of value in helping him win the championship for his palooka. So he keeps the guy with an eye handy by allowing him to lead the orchestra in his nightclub. Marilyn Maxwell does her first screen warbling as the singer with whom Kyser falls in love, and William Gargan is the manager who loses her to him.

THE FALCON AND THE CO-EDS (RKO) sends Tom Conway into a girls' school to solve a murder mystery. Conway, who took over the title role from George Sanders, his brother, has more to offer than such a little adventure allows him to show. Followers of the series may find it to their liking, although the mystery is as carelessly worked out as the title. The students aren't co-eds, for they attend an exclusive school for girls.

MINESWEEPER (Paramount) is a shipshape action drama that gets where it's going—but fast. Dealing with the training of crews for Navy minesweepers, it also relates the personal story of a former deserter who returns to the service after war breaks and gives his life to save the shipmate who is his rival in love. Richard Arlen, Jean Parker and Russell Hayden form the romantic triangle.

SON OF DRACULA and THE MAD GHOUL (Universal) make up a double dose of spine-chillers which are being reviewed together because they will always play on the same bill together. In the Dracula offering, Lon Chaney plays the offspring of that old debil vampire who comes to America as Count Alucard (Dracula spelled backward) and leads Robert Paige, Louise Allbritton, Evelyn Ankers and Frank Craven a merry chase. "The Mad Ghoul" is about a grave robber who is under the control of a mad scientist.

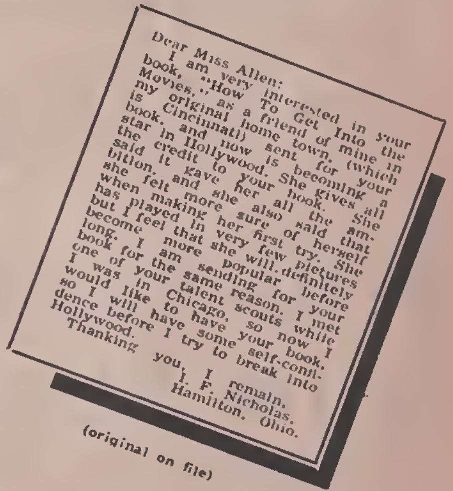
THE SAME GOOD FORTUNE CAN BE YOURS

HERE'S THE LETTER WHICH TELLS HOW SHE DID IT



Dear Miss Allen:
I am very interested in your book, "How To Get Into the Movies," as a friend of mine in my original home town, (which is Cincinnati) sent for your book, and now is becoming a star in Hollywood. She gives all the credit to your book. She said it gave her all the ambition, and she also said that she felt more sure of herself when making her first try. She has played in very few pictures but I feel that she will definitely become more popular before long. I am sending for your book for the same reason. I met one of your talent scouts while I was in Chicago, so now I would like to have some self-confidence before I try to break into Hollywood.
Thanking you, I remain,
I. F. Nicholas,
Hamilton, Ohio.

BETTY HUTTON

minute he calls that some business appointment has detained him.

"If he is thoughtful and sends orchids, I'm delighted. But if he's poor and can't afford flowers, that's all right, too.

"And I can't hurt anybody just to keep him interested or dangling. I can't parry wits in a clever little flirtation that is supposed to be just an interlude. When I fall in love, I fall—and what I mean is orange blossoms and white veils and all that sort of thing—not just a little memory for both of us to look back on when we meet months later at one of the night clubs, with somebody else. The trouble with me," Betty sighed, "is that my cards are on the table. Beatrice Fairfax should send me some good advice."

Now I ask you, did you ever hear talk like that from any other movie queen? She is so young—just twenty-two—that perhaps her heart has not been dented as seriously as her pride in some of her "unlucky" romances.

Of course, her name has been linked with several men who weren't even vaguely romances in her life. Recently, for example, Betty has been surprised to find herself mentioned in print and over the radio as being "interested" in Arturo de Cordova. The only thing wrong with that story is that Arturo is not divorced from his Mexican wife (as this is written) and when the divorce is final he is expected to marry Lupe Velez.

This sort of thing doesn't seriously upset Betty. "I'm still at the stage where I can't believe they're interested enough in me to print anything—true or false," she says.

But just see, when it was the real thing, Betty gladly told the world.

For some time now, too, even before this making definite of her marriage plans with husband-to-be Charles Martin, Betty has been concentrating on finding a home she can call her own. "I want a home of my own so bad I just ache," she said. "It seems that the past five years have brought me everything I've wanted, but my own home. We have been living in apartments—Ma and my stepfather and I—ever since we've been in Hollywood. And while it is nice, you have to be show people to realize what a home of your own really means.

"I have looked at places by the dozens. So has Mama. Every once in awhile we think we have found the right house. Not so long ago we saw a wonderful house. It was a dream—at least it was a dream to a kid who used to sing in beer gardens. But when they found out it was Betty Hutton who wanted to buy,-the price went up to $15,000."

You have to laugh, sometimes, at the things Betty says and the way she says them. She doesn't care. She wants you to. Laughter has made her what she is today—one of the most valuable stars in Hollywood. But somehow and someway there is a pensiveness and wistfulness about this little madcap singer.

She's "Murder," all right—but she's a sweet kid, too.

SGT. GENE AUTRY

training, his eyes very blue in the midst of his wind-weathered tan, he speaks with a homely forthrightness that is out of this day and age.

"On my radio program for a while we were makin' a lot of government announcements. I was sittin' up there every week talkin' to other men, sayin, 'Get into the Army, fellows—', tellin' them about their duty and the Army's advantages. I got to feelin' so guilty I hardly had the heart to say it any more. The people listenin' to me every week, I knew, were all folks who liked to believe what I said. If it was true, why wasn't I doin' it myself?"

As a star, Autry has travelled more than 100,000 miles yearly to make personal appearances. Close contact with public adulation has left its imprint on Gene. Although sex has never been his selling point, any gathering in his honor includes the prescribed number of frenzied females of the type that causes all Hollywood he-men to pale. He could easily endow a Haven for Stampeded Screen Stars, with the price of the custom-built sombreros and shirts he has had torn from his head and back by adult admirers.

The majority of Autry fans, however, are kids—the kids who govern what he says and does both on and off the screen. Because of the kids, a Western star worth his stirrups, never drinks or smokes before the cameras. He wins his gal by deed, and his daring does not extend to the sissy practice of planting a kiss on her brow or lips. Off-screen he also watches his p's and q's (publicity and quaffing). He steers clear of scandal and is never photographed at a bar nor with a glass in his hand.

Kid fans don't clutch and claw and tear at their idols. They stand at a respectful distance, their eyes big with worship and awe. Gene is looking forward to being able to meet that solemn gaze after the war.

"'What outfit were you with, Gene?' they're goin' to ask me. That's why I was proud to get into the U.S. Air Force. As for a commission—I didn't honestly feel I was any more entitled to it than millions of fellows just like me who had to begin in the ranks. Luckily, there's only two ratings that really qualify with the kids—they want you to be either a General or a Sergeant. It'd take too long to be a General—but the Sergeant I could give 'em in a hurry!"

"That's the whole story of how they got shoes on me," he sums it all up.

The last statement is no exaggeration. At the time he went into service, Autry had two pairs of shoes to his name, a pair of golf shoes and a pair of tennis shoes. For all other occasions he wore boots, handmade with a long-horn steer motif of his own design. They cost $40 the pair and for many years had been the chief revenue of a bootmaker in a small cow-town near Tioga, Texas, where Gene was born.

He hadn't a business suit to his name. His $10,000 wardrobe consisted entirely of custom-built cowboy suits, running the color gamut from brilliant purple to canary yellow, with one snow-white outfit for formal occasions, such as a visit to the White House. Part of his trappings, too, were the eight silver-mounted saddles on which he rode, two of them costing $2,500 apiece.

Today khaki becomes him, inwardly and outwardly. Army training is rigorous for a man of thirty-eight—even for a man born on a ranch and spending his youth with a travelling medicine show.

"But it's worth it to be with the greatest Army in the world," Gene says.

"It's great because a fellow like me can get into it. There we are—

Official Marine Photo

The one and only handsome Hollywood No. 1 man, Tyrone Power, was at one time a fellow boot and a friend of mine at the Marine Base in San Diego. One morning I was discussing Tyrone with his Sergeant, who said, "He is the best boot I've seen go through camp since Barney Ross."

I remember, too, one sunny afternoon when I was washing clothes across from the former two-thousand-dollar-a-week actor, and he had a larger than usual washing—but he began with a smile instead of a frown, and completed the job in the limited time set.

Ty set a fine example and goal for all Hollywood actors. He was well liked for his persistent friendliness and consideration to everyone in close contact with him every day.

bankers, lawyers, farmers, truck drivers, grocery clerks, and movie stars—all of us in there, fighting for the same things. I'm serving a country that gives me the right to make pictures if I want to, and the fellow beside me is defending his right to plow and tend his corn."

On the whole, his Army mates have treated him like any other fellow in uniform. In camp he finds it easy to be natural with them; on the outside once in a while a fellow soldier turns shy.

Several weeks ago he was being driven home from Santa Ana by a friend who stopped to pick up several other soldiers also. Gene was in the front seat, and the conversation went along normally for about a half hour, until suddenly he turned to face one of the boys in the rear and flashed a smile.

"Gene Autry—gee whiz!" said the young fellow in a stricken voice.

"I'll never forget the way his jaw dropped," says Gene. "Spoiled the whole ride—I couldn't get another word but 'yes sir' and 'no sir' out of those fellows for the rest of the trip!"

Ferrying bombers overseas is not what Gene considers a dangerous occupation.

"I don't think a Ferry pilot takes time out for fear," he says. "He's pretty busy—they don't waste much time on those hops any more. He knows he's flying with the best organized command in the world. If anything happens it's not because of what he's doing, but because his number happens to be up—so what's the use of worrying about it?"

Pin-Up Girls, the Sarge tells us, are not the main topic of conversation in an Army camp. In fact, he can't ever remember having seen a star's picture in a barracks.

"'Course, I may have been looking in the wrong barracks," he admits, "but from where I look, it's generally a picture of some girl from home you see in the boys' lockers, a sweetheart or wife, or maybe a mother.

"What all the boys want is to go—so they can come back again. Folks think Army men haven't much call to look ahead, but the boys themselves do nothing but long range planning. That farm they're going to come back and buy, those kids they're going to put through school, that's what the fellows keep their thoughts on."

Other important topics in camp are movies, a fighting man's greatest source of entertainment. They don't care much for war pictures, although a few of the more authentic ones have met with a good reception. On the whole, the men prefer music, love and laughs. The last two commodities, says the Sarge, are a good thing to put into your letters to them, too. The Crosby-Sinatra controversy has hit the home camps, and says friend Gene, Bing hasn't a thing to worry about.

Autry himself is doing a little long range planning. Walking over the green and rolling grounds of his home, he points to a blackened space among the tall trees where his house stood, until it was destroyed by fire recently. After the war, he will rebuild it.

Meantime, Mrs. Autry has moved into the semi-circular playhouse at the rear of the estate, and Gene makes this his headquarters when he is home. Granted that the playhouse would be a very acceptable permanent residence for ordinary folk, for a movie star it is gratifyingly simple—low-roofed, pine-walled, a lot of windows. There is an aquamarine swimming pool in back, and a badminton court, both luxury items but simple in design and fittings. You are willing to wager that the house will be similarly solid and unaffected, reflecting the tastes of the man and woman who live there.

Gene is married to a boyhood sweetheart, a young schoolmarm he swept off her feet by sheer charm, long before she knew if he was even going to turn out to be a paying proposition. Fame and fortune so far hasn't had its alleged effect upon their happiness together.

"What I like most about my wife," he tells you, "is her grand understanding of people and their problems. She's so human, it would be hard not to be happy with her."

While Gene Autry, the soldier, is away, it is interesting to note that the business of Gene Autry, the cowboy star, goes on. There are millions of sweatshirts, holsters, chaps, spurs, cartridge belts, shaving creams, hair oil, toy balloons and other products bearing his name, still being sold. Royalties from his music publishing firm still come rolling in. Presents from admirers still arrive—the day we sat with Gene in his trophy room he was unwrapping an object knitted of khaki yarn, trying like every soldier who ever received a like package to figure out whether the darn thing was a helmet or a chest protector.

In a small building beside the pool, two stenographers report daily to sort and answer the fan mail, which shows no decrease after his year off the screen. The room in which they work is fitted up like a postoffice, with boxes for every state in the union, and every country in the world. It is a matter of surprise that New York, center of sophistication, is stamped on a large bulk of the letters. (Autry broke all attendance records at Madison Square Garden with his last rodeo.) Mail from Europe, strangely, has increased.

When the war broke out, Gene was in Liverpool, England. With Champ, he had just completed one of the most triumphant tours of the British Isles ever made by any man, picture star or politician. In Dublin he sang to what has been estimated as the largest audience ever assembled, 750,000 people who packed the public squares until they photographed not like humans, but like caviar in a can.

In his scrap-book are European newspapers front-paging his coming. Typical of them is the British sheet which scare-heads his interview clear across the masthead: "Gunning For Fame, With Gene Autry." Pushed into smaller type at the bottom of the page are a few sinister sayings from a couple of other gunners, Hitler and Mussolini, and an announcement: "Roosevelt Makes Last Plea For Peace."

Gene remembers his pleasure when the little Princess Elizabeth publicly announced him as her favorite picture star, but the thrill he'll never forget was when he left Ireland. Thousands of fans lined the dock to see him off, and the last sound he heard was their raised voices, singing "Come Back to Erin."

"I'm goin' back—soon, I hope," he says. "But this time Champ will have to stay home. I'll be goin' over in a bomber!"

ALAN LADD

that threw him. Not that he complained. He knew he didn't have that privileged right, and he was there to do what he was told to do, like any other good soldier.

He was proud as Punch the day he got his Corporal's stripes, but any sensitive, intelligent corporal knows the distance from there to General is about four generations.

"Oddly enough, though," Alan says, "my year in the Army was the most pleasant one I've ever known. I wasn't so far away from Susie but that I could get back and see her occasionally. I was lucky to be near Sue when Alana was born, and as you know, she nearly got born in a movie theater. It seems as though Sue and I are always in movie theaters at the important moments of our life. I proposed to Sue in a theater. My career, of course, has been there, and there we were, when Alana started making her debut into this world, and did we have to make a run for that hospital!

"The Army, however, was like going back to school for me. I hadn't had so much of that book routine before. Fighting my way up, I hadn't had much chance at close friendships. In the Army, there were both. I liked the discipline. I liked the fellows. I liked the discussions we had. I went into the war impulsively, even emotionally, but as we'd sit around and beat our chops, I began to understand, from fellows smarter than I, what this war is about and what we are really fighting for. You know how actors are—all 'I,' 'I.' Well, in the army 'I' means nothing. It's the family, not only your family, or even the family that is America and American ideals, but the family of nations, the vast, international family of men of good-will—that's what counts and is what we are fighting for.

"With that in my heart, you can imagine how I felt when they kept hospitalizing me. Know what I'm living on now? A diet of milk, crackers and cheese. And that for me, strictly a meat and potato man up until now! Why, I wouldn't even eat lamb, and as for stew, oh brother! Strictly beef for me, it was. So now look. I could get along without teeth on my present diet."

The doctors have demanded that Alan take a complete rest for a few months, and this time he is obeying orders. When he comes back in "And Now, Tomorrow," you will see not the killer but the Alan Ladd who is the dreamer and the romantic.

"I think I'll be quite different," Alan said. "Certainly there's something I want my acting to express that I never even thought about before I was in the Army. To provide excitement isn't enough. I want to help sell America to America, to the world. I want people to rediscover those ideals that maybe a lot of us lost for a while. It isn't enough for us merely to live up to the things that America stands for. We've got to live way beyond that, so that we can inspire the whole world."

"You're still in the fight," I said.

"With everything I've got," Alan said.

UNHAPPY ENDING

psychic summons drew her glance to the door. There stood one Robert Walker, devouring her with his eyes. In a scant second's elapse, his glance wrote all those letters he had never sent; his smile sang all the love songs his voice had never uttered; his lifted eyebrows asked all the questions his courage could never frame.

Jennifer excused herself from the cleric and spoke to Bob in the breathless half-sentences appropriate for such a moment. Only one thing emerged from the conversation that she was to remember afterward: they made a date for the following night.

As Bob didn't feel that he had enough happy cabbage to go on to school, he took a jack-of-all-trades job at the Cherry Lane Theater in Greenwich Village. Jennifer, learning about it, decided that she should be doing the same. "If you're going to troupe, so am I," was the way she put it. After all, she had done a lot of trouping on the road in the Isley Stock Company before that.

Entrance to this theater was via a stairway built . . . doubtless . . . by Senor Methuselah's grandfather. If honor is to be attached by age, this stairway was the most honorable covey of steps on earth . . . and twice as rickety.

The dressing rooms were roofed daisy-petal style: one space leaked, one didn't. Getting dressed and made up on a sodden night was like darting in and out of a giant sprinkler system, some of the outlets of which were clogged, but might give forth a fountain at any instant.

Additional hazard was the four-legged population, increasing with an abandon characteristic of rats. One week each small aperture in the corners of the dressing room was filled with bright, beady eyes. The next week the eyes had increased by number until there was considerable scuffling to see who should occupy the peephole to watch the pretty lady. By the end of the second week, the curious rodents were lining up along the wall and all but demanding cheese.

Jennifer and Bob, meeting behind scenes, clasped one another and breathed an ecstatic sentence. "Darling . . . isn't it wonderful?"

Jennifer's family came north to see just what was going on in their daughter's life, and were shown . . . with adjectives . . . through the theater. Funny thing. They didn't find the leaky dressing rooms quaint, the breakaway stairs intriguing, nor the rats too, too atmospheric. With shaking head they returned to Tulsa and Took Steps.

Shortly thereafter Jennifer received an offer from a Tulsa radio station to select, direct, stage, and cast a series of plays as sustaining programs. She might, the offer stipulated, select her own leading man. Which explains the immediate presence in Tulsa of Jennifer (at twenty-five dollars a week) and Robert Walker (at thirty-five a week).

On the way to the radio station one night they came to an important conclusion: when they had saved two hundred dollars, they would be married. This goal was attained in January, 1939.

They got their first chance at Hollywood then, or rather, Jennifer got hers. The picture was a Western at Republic, "New Frontier." Completed in less than two weeks, as Westerns are, it was a hard enough ordeal on actors like John Wayne, the star, who was accustomed to the swift technique: for a young, inexperienced actress like Jennifer it was agony.

Bob sat around the stages, miserable, waiting for her. No casting director gave him a tumble. "Just a skinny amateur," they called this lad whom mighty MGM today regards as their greatest discovery since Gable.

Jennifer galloped, literally and figuratively, through another Western, and then the Walkers decided if they starved, they could take no more of it.

Back in New York, Bob felt he had amassed enough student hours over the air so that he could conquer a big time station. The newlywed Walkers took a small cottage on Long Island, and Bob's radio ambition was fulfilled.

While Bob was building a personal career, Jennifer wasn't wasting her time. She and Bob had decided to have a family promptly, so that parents and children could grow up together. By October, 1942, there were two young Walkers—both boys. The first born was named Michael and the next, Robert, Jr. and Jennifer resembled a woman's magazine heroine in that she looked younger and more winsome than ever.

She and Bob decided that she, too, should resume her career. After taking several tests she was put under contract by David Selznick. Meanwhile, 20th Century-Fox had bought "The Song of Bernadette" and were conducting almost as exhaustive a search as was instituted for "Scarlet O'Hara." One look at her test convinced the biggies.

She bundled up the two youngsters and came to Hollywood at Bob's insistence, leaving him in New York. Just before Thanksgiving, one Saturday night, Jennifer placed a lonesome telephone call to her husband. There was no answer. All day Sunday she repeated her call without result. She gave this failure little thought; she knew Bob was busy and that any number of things might have kept him beyond telephone range.

Yet, when there was no letter from him on Monday morning, she discovered that she had swallowed a golf ball that had refused to budge beyond the point of her solar plexus. Sunk in preoccupation, she took the two boys over to a neighborhood park.

While she was keeping one eye on the progeny and one on her knitting, she decided to make that long distance telephone call her life work until she gained an answer.

"Come on, boys, we have to go back to the house," she called.

Young Mike, being nearly three, had a bright idea. "To meet Daddy?"

Jennifer bit her lip and made no answer. Half a block from the apartment, Bobbie emitted an Indian war whoop and charged down the street, straight into the arms of the man who arose slowly from his seat on a suitcase.

After greetings and kisses were exchanged, Bob explained—that incredible grin creasing his face—that he had tested for MGM without telling Jennifer a thing about it, and that he was signed to a long term contract. His first picture was to be "Bataan" and after that, "Private Hargrove."

If Mr. Walker's sturdy shoulder absorbed a few of his wife's delighted tears, who is to be surprised? "Get us," he chuckled. "Aren't we something?"

So that's their story. Who could have predicted that such a story would be fated to come to an unhappy ending? There seems no plausible "why" for the failure of a marriage given so many advantages. Explanations are lacking, but the regrets are many; for the Walkers' was a married happiness generously admired—and envied.

breathtakingly beautiful than he had remembered. Then she was in his arms, and for a breathless moment the world stood still.

"The plaza is packed with people," he said as he released her at last. "Everybody is there. Music! Dancing! Come along."

She hesitated, torn between her desire and the fear of offending the Viceroy, for his displeasure could mean the end of all the things Uncle Pio had planned for her, the triumphs that had come to mean so much to her, too. But when she told Manuel and saw the hurt clouding his eyes she knew that nothing mattered except being with him.

At first she went unnoticed in the crowd. Then suddenly there was a cry of recognition.

"Look!" someone cried out. "La Villegas! It is she!" And they clustered around her feeling that for all the glory that had come to them she was still one of them, of the people. "La Villegas!" they said, and they couldn't hold back their happiness. "You have come back to us! You have not forgotten!"

They asked her to sing and it was like the old days, singing to them, with Manuel's eyes fixed on her so eagerly. Only Esteban, hovering there on the edge of the crowd, refused to be swayed by her magic and he couldn't control the hatred in his eyes nor the sickness in his soul, feeling that from then on he would always be second in his brother's heart.

He felt there could never be any happiness for him again and he went back to his room at the inn wanting to escape the music and the laughter mocking his own sorrow. But his tormented thoughts were still with him. It was almost as though he could see Micaela in Manuel's arms, hear the soft words he was whispering to her.

At first it was like that. Hand in hand they wandered through the gay crowds. It wasn't until Micaela saw the Viceroy's carriage being driven rapidly towards the palace with Uncle Pio sitting so dejectedly in it that she had that pang of conscience.

"I hope Uncle Pio is not in trouble," she said softly. "The Viceroy may be angry."

"It serves him right that you didn't go at his call," Manuel said darkly. "These Viceroys think everything belongs to them."

"You see I didn't go." Micaela smiled as they turned into a small side street away from the crowds. "I came with you."

"But you were thinking of going," he said. "You must have accepted or he wouldn't have sent the coach."

Micaela became indignant now, too.

"Why shouldn't I?" she demanded.

"Don't you know why they ask you?" His young voice was raw with his misery. "Your name is on the front of the theatre. They want to look you over, like a freak, at close range. The women will make fun of you, the men will make love to you. And between the two you will be standing on your head."

Her small chin lifted.

"You think I would not be able to deal with them?" she asked indig-

Are You in the Know?

Are these Lindy Hoppers doing—
☐ A Boogie
☐ A Shorty George
☐ A Tip

"Know how" is what makes the difference between a smooth rug-cutter and a dud! So lady, be hep to this "shine" step. It's a Tip—and here's another: Know how to stay in the fun regardless of what time of the month it is! It's simple, for Kotex sanitary napkins are more comfortable—and that special safety center keeps you protected—poise-perfect. So save your "jitters" for a jive session.

This Hair-do's for you—if ☐ Your face is long
☐ Heart-shaped
☐ Round

Down with pompadours—up with sweeping manes! Newest locks have a flat-topped look. They're shorter, sleek, often center-parted. Vary this hair style to suit your face-type, but if your face is long, take the short hair-do shown here—flat crowned, and fluffed a bit at the sides. The "flat" look is a grooming commandment when "certain" outlines threaten a sleek costume. That's when you thank Kotex for those flat pressed ends. Because they're not stubby, no one will guess your secret.

How would you introduce them?
☐ "Capt. Smith, this is Lieut. Brown"
☐ "Miss Brown, may I present Capt. Smith"
☐ "Lieut. Brown, Capt. Smith"

Learn your military P's and Q's! When introducing army officers, mention the one with higher rank first—even if the other is a woman. "Captain Smith, this is Lieutenant Brown" is correct (and don't address the Wac as "Miss"!). Knowing your army etiquette is a social must, these wartime days. On difficult days, too, you can preserve your "social security." Just depend on the comfort Kotex gives, for Kotex stays soft while wearing. You'll learn—comfort, confidence and Kotex go together!

nantly. "Is that what you mean?"

He ignored the question.

"Do you promise not to go?" he asked.

"No," she said flatly.

"You will!" He grasped her elbow and wheeled her around. Then suddenly all his fury against her was spent. He took her in his arms but she was still resentful as she twisted away from him.

"You talk about the Viceroy," she said hotly. "You want everything your way, too. I shall do as I please." And as he stood there uncertainly she turned and ran away, her laughter drifting back to him, mocking him.

After that first rebellious moment he ran after her, but she was lost among the merrymakers. And so at last he went to the inn. And it was there he found Esteban and saw the blood spouting from the wound in his breast and the stained knife lying beside him. And he knew it was because of Micaela his brother had tried to kill himself.

The doctor came but he did not give much encouragement as he dressed the wound. All that night Manuel listened in agony as his brother raved in delirium—and always the name on his lips was Micaela's.

"She will not bring you happiness," he sobbed. "She does not love you. But no matter, perhaps I will not trouble you any more."

"You will live," Manuel said quietly. And it helped to keep repeating the words over and over again.

The darkness went and morning came. The street below quickened with the commonplace sounds of the day, but Manuel didn't even hear them. It was as if he were lost to all conscious thought just as Esteban was. And it wasn't until the door opened and he saw Micaela standing there that he felt himself coming slowly, painfully back to life again.

"Manuel," she said softly. "Doña Mercedes told me."

At the sound of her voice, Esteban was shocked out of his stupor.

"So you have come, Micaela!" he shouted. And in his rage he found the strength to raise himself up on his elbow. "You have come to see me die! You thought you could take Manuel away from me, but you were not worthy of him. You do not love anyone but yourself."

"Esteban!" she said in a horrified whisper. "How can you say that?"

Esteban sank back exhausted, and for a moment Manuel thought that he was dead. Half crazed with fear, he turned to Micaela.

"Don't torture him! Go away. I never want to see you again!" he cried.

Esteban didn't die, but Manuel became a changed man. Something seemed to have died in him. He was morose and silent, and when Esteban's recovery was complete he sailed on a journey half around the world.

Micaela never spoke of him after that. For many weeks she kept to herself and her work in the theatre. More invitations came from the Viceroy, every one of them more urgent than the last had been, and finally after one of her greatest triumphs she accepted.

Never had the Viceroy prepared for any guest as he did for Micaela. He placed her at his right hand at the dinner table, the position of honor which was formerly held by the Marquesa de Montemayer—and naturally the great lady resented this. But she was too clever to show her displeasure. Instead, she sat back in the drawing room afterwards while the other women guests taunted the interloper, reminding her of the days they had tossed coins to her when she sang in the streets.

Micaela sat there silently, unable to strike back at them. She had played great ladies, queens, empresses and always she knew what to say because Uncle Pio had taught her the words. But tonight when she needed words as never before, no words would come. She didn't know her part. She was helpless.

And as the Marquesa saw the Viceroy's anger mounting, she realized how much he cared for Micaela and knew how she could make use of his adoration. So when Micaela, stung beyond endurance, rose as if she were leaving, the Marquesa went to her.

"My dear la Villegas," she said. "Pay no attention to them. There's nothing like jealousy to sharpen the tongue."

And Micaela thanked her gratefully, feeling that she had found a friend.

It was at this part of the story Brother Juniper knew that he needed help again. He had recorded all that he had discovered of these lives, but the solution still evaded him, the threads were still tangled. So again he went to the Abbess, imploring her to tell him all she knew of the Marquesa.

She answered reluctantly, because she still wondered if it were not impious to question the acts of God. But little by little the friar learned of the strange enigma in the life of the Marquesa. How she suffered through a love that embittered her whole nature, a love for her only child, Doña Clara, a love so demanding and possessive that it was not love at all but a selfish obsession. He learned too, how after her daughter had married and gone to Spain the Marquesa became so embittered that from then on a blind emotion colored her whole life, making her think of nothing but how she could bring her daughter back to her again.

At last she went to the Abbess, asking if there were not one of the young orphaned girls in the Convent she could take into her house to be her companion and so ease her loneliness. And so eloquently did she make her plea that the Abbess selected Pepita, the young girl she loved more than any of the others, the girl she had decided would one day be her successor. For she knew that a stay at the Marquesa's villa would be an experience that would develop the girl's mind and teach her a certain worldliness that would help her in her work in later years.

But Pepita could not take Doña Clara's place, and her presence in the house only made the mother's loneliness the more unbearable. And so the days passed, and the weeks and the months, in that agony of longing—until that night of the Viceroy's dinner when the Marquesa saw the opportunity for using his infatuation for Micaela to serve her one compelling interest.

Uncle Pio was the proudest man in Peru, as the Viceroy became more and more enamored of Micaela. But his triumph was short lived. For Micaela, finding a peace she had never known before in the company of this man so much older than herself, the first man she had ever known who did not make demands on her but only tried to please her, retired from the theatre.

Several years ago Joan Crawford was shopping in one of New York's popular department stores when she was mobbed by fans. She escaped from them into a very exclusive store. As she cowered in a corner, she looked out on Fifth Avenue and saw Einstein, the discoverer of relativity, walking along hatless, his hair ruffled by the wind. There were no fans swarming around him. But Miss Crawford sighed, "Isn't he wonderful?" and stood with her nose plastered to the window, just as her fans were doing, except that they had stood outside looking in, and she stood inside looking out.

She liked the man for himself, for he was charming and it had always been his pleasure to please women. But more than that it gave her a feeling of accomplishing something much more worthwhile than she had ever accomplished in the theatre. And she saw that because of his association with her, the Viceroy was brought closer to the people. Because she had come from their humble source, his interest in their welfare and education was awakened. She knew there were people around her who hated her, Don Gonzalo most of all. But so secure did she feel of the Viceroy's devotion and the Marquesa's friendship that none of the others mattered.

Then came the day when she was to discover the Marquesa was her enemy. Strange that it was Esteban who brought the news to her. Strange it was for her, whom he still hated, that he was breaking his oath as a scribe. Maybe in his perverse way he felt he was being loyal to Manuel, or maybe he was trying to atone for having taken Manuel from her. The reason, whatever it was, lay hidden in his complex brain.

The Marquesa had summoned him to write a letter to her daughter, since her own fingers were so crippled with rheumatism she couldn't hold a pen. And Micaela listened horrified as Esteban told the things the old woman had dictated. There was some truth in them, but she had embroidered and exaggerated the facts of the Viceroy's love for Micaela, bidding her daughter to whisper them about the Court in Madrid so that the gossip would reach the King's ear and he would recall the Viceroy and elevate another in his place.

"The other, I hope, will be your husband," she had dictated. And a smile had played about her lips as she spoke. "He is in high favor with the King and I pray that he may return here to rule and bring you back to me."

Micaela felt she had turned to stone as she listened. All the peace she had felt was gone, as she realized the Viceroy might suffer disgrace because of her. Esteban had destroyed the letter but there would be others. She had to find a way of stopping the Marquesa's venom before it was too late.

She had depended on Uncle Pio for so many years that it was to him she turned now.

"I dare not tell the Viceroy," she whispered. "If I admit I am involving him in trouble, he'd be furious, and at me. I don't know what to do. I need you, because as always when I need them, I have no words."

"We'll find them," Uncle Pio said, and it helped that his voice sounded so confident. "When will you see the Marquesa again?"

"This afternoon at a small musicale," she said. "Everyone of importance will be there. They have asked me to sing."

"Good." He smiled. "We will have a special song ready for them. Yes, new words to an old song."

No one at that musicale had any warning when Micaela began to sing. There was the melody she had sung so often, her voice as gay and lilting as ever. But the words of the song lashed at the old Marquesa. Her name wasn't mentioned, but no one could mistake the old crow Micaela sang about, the old crow who drove her daughter away from her by her cawing and pecking only to try to bring her back by turning the palace upside down so that it would make a regal nest for her fledgling.

The old Marquesa sat in frozen silence to the very end. Then somehow from the depths of her rage and humiliation she managed to summon a dignity that she held about her like a cold, proud cloak as she left the room, as she drove through the streets to her home. But it could not protect her from herself.

She staggered as she walked up the stairs to her room, and then at the threshold a new fury seized her as she saw the girl Pepita kneeling before the Prie Dieu in the alcove, the little altar that had been her daughter's. But before her anger could be voiced, she heard the girl's whispered words. She was praying for her, the Marquesa! She was pleading with God to forgive her for planning evil against a man who had never harmed her.

"She believes that she loves her daughter," the girl said softly. "But true love is not cruel, it serves unselfishly without greed. Help her to understand that happiness cannot come from evil."

The Marquesa did not wait to hear any more. With a strangled sob she turned and walked heavily down to the drawing room and sank into a chair, her trembling hands covering her face.

She heard a commotion in the street outside, but she did not stir. Then she was conscious of someone coming into the room, but at first all she saw was the bare feet of the woman standing before her. Then as her eyes travelled slowly upwards she saw first the black dress worn by penitents, then Micaela's cold proud face, Micaela who had been ordered by the Viceroy to come there as a common sinner and beg forgiveness; for even before the Viceroy's love for her came his code of behavior among ladies and gentlemen and she had violated that code.

Only those few moments before the Marquesa would have gloried in Micaela's shame, but now there was only the sense of her own transgressions. It was she who had sinned, not Micaela. And as her stumbling words confessed her selfishness and wrong doing, Micaela could not hold back her sobs as she sank on her knees before her.

"Tomorrow I shall go to the Shrine at San Luis Rey," the Marquesa said softly. "And my prayer shall be: 'Let me live now, let me begin again.'"

She began to weep then, and so for a little while they wept together.

When Micaela left at last her head was held proudly and all the shame of being humbled in the streets was gone. Then as she went into her villa she heard her name called and she turned to see Manuel standing there, shaking with rage because of the ordeal that had been forced on her. His ship had come in only that day and he had seen her in her penitent's garb, but he had been unable to reach her through the crowd.

"Come with me, Micaela," he begged. But even as they stood there, their hands clinging, the door opened and the Viceroy entered with the obsequious Don Gonzalo at his heels.

Manuel had never been one for dis-

Her First Love

"It all happened in Rio de Janeiro. I was only seven at the time, and the boy went to school with me.

"For some reason, we were always getting into trouble. Finally love landed me in the hospital. I had been given a beautiful doll for my birthday, a gift from my father; and I wanted to show it to the boy I loved. I stood on the second veranda of our home, dangling the doll to show him how wonderful it was. But, standing on the ground, he yelled back that he couldn't see it. So I tied a string to the doll, and tried to lower it to the ground so my love could examine it. Unfortunately, I lost my balance, fell off the veranda and landed on top of my beau. Both of us were seriously injured and had to stay in the hospital for fifteen days. The doll, of course, was broken into a thousand pieces.

"After that nearly fatal accident, Mother didn't seem to think it was wise for me to play with that boy friend any longer. So the romance was over."

cretion and now his furious epithets struck at the Viceroy for the public shame he had brought on Micaela. Don Gonzalo stepped forward threateningly, his hand on the hilt of his sword, and Manuel's involuntarily went to the pistol stuck in his belt. It was all that Don Gonzalo wanted, that gesture, and he was quick to seize on it and put Manuel under arrest. Micaela could have reasoned with the Viceroy alone, but with Don Gonzalo there, reminding the Viceroy of his danger, she was powerless.

"I am protecting him from himself," the Viceroy said as the door closed on the others. "I can't blame him for loving you, I do myself. But one of us must change."

"You mean I must change!" Micaela flung the words at him bitterly. "All my life men have been telling me what to do. Uncle Pio, Manuel, then you! Educating me, managing me, dictating to me, correcting everything I did from how to use a fork to walking in bare feet! I've been going to school long enough. I've graduated!"

"Then today is doubly important," he said. "You remember our engagement to visit the city of Huanuco tomorrow to dedicate the new hospital? Since the hospital was your idea it is important that you go. Not for me, but for the people."

"You expect me to do this with Manuel in prison?" she raged.

"I expect you to carry out your duty, as I do," he said. Then his voice softened. "Micaela, I came to you today to ask you to be my wife."

It was her sublime triumph but it meant nothing. She looked at him and her eyes were veiled, inscrutable.

"You have paid me the greatest compliment . . . too late," she said. And then coldly, "You haven't told me what you intend doing with Manuel."

"We can discuss that on the road," he said. "I suggest that you make ready."

It was as they were leaving early the next morning that the word came that Manuel had escaped. Micaela tried to hold back her wild triumph. But as she sat beside the Viceroy in the state carriage she shuddered for Manuel's future safety, as she saw Don Gonzalo's baleful eyes fixed on her. He had never forgiven her for that unintentional insult of that day so long ago.

She was glad to see the Marquesa's carriage already there as they reached the bridge, for she did not relish that first moment when she would be alone with the Viceroy. And as he crossed, the Marquesa walked behind him, as befitted her rank, with the child Pepita helping her. Then as Don Gonzalo followed, Micaela's breath came in a surprised gasp as she saw Esteban hurrying to the bridge. And as she stood aside to let him pass, an old Indian followed him on the narrow span.

The Viceroy had reached the other end as Micaela stepped on the bridge. She had gone just a few steps when she heard a familiar whistle and turned to see Uncle Pio hidden among the rocks near the entrance of the bridge. Then as she saw Manuel crouching beside him, she started back, her emotions torn between joy and her fear that he would be discovered. She must warn him. She must tell him.

Suddenly she heard that tearing sound and felt the bridge slipping from under her. She felt strong hands grasping hers, pulling her back. And then there was the safety of Manuel's arms holding her as she heard the frenzied screams of the five who had still been on the bridge—Esteban, the Marquesa and the child Pepita, Don Gonzalo and the old Indian.

Brother Juniper had recorded all of this, all that he had learned of those five who had been flung to death from the broken bridge. But still the full meaning evaded him, for each time he found a truth he found also a contradiction. There were the different things that had been said of Micaela. Various people called her various things. Artist, adventuress, upstart, mongrel and great lady, she had been called all of these, for no human being seems the same to any other two.

Even the Viceroy had perhaps been misunderstood, Brother Juniper thought, for he had accepted the fall of the bridge as a sign of the gulf separating him from Micaela and so had done nothing to threaten her happiness with Manuel.

The friar had learned, too, that it was Uncle Pio who had managed Manuel's escape from the prison and that Esteban had set out to overtake the Viceroy in the hope that he might win a full pardon for his brother. But somehow, try as he would, he could not put all the threads together. Why had Esteban lived before when his life was in such grave danger, only to die now?

Why, why, why?

The questions burned in Brother Juniper's brain, but there was no answer to any of them.

So at last he knew that the Abbess had been right and that no human mind can measure the design of God Almighty. There were the dead and there were the living, and no one could cross the bridge dividing them, the bridge fashioned of the love that had once held them together.

Brother Juniper recorded the lives of all these people. And just as he could find only puzzles in their pasts, so it was impossible that he could predict what was their future. "Manuel and Micaela—will they be married?" he asked Uncle Pio. But the wise old Pio wouldn't comment.

interviews with members of my own sex. Questions that I can put to a woman star without batting an eye would make me feel like a fool if I had to ask them of men. However, my favorite actors to talk to, casual like, are Cary Grant, Jimmy Cagney, Franchot Tone, and Bob Taylor.

An interview with Bob Hope is always a memorable experience, except that unless you are a shorthand expert (which I am not) you're apt to forget half of his cracks by the time you're ready to write your story. Bob must have a million gags stored up in that agile brain, and he can twist any of them around to suit the occasion.

One of my particular pets is the droll Helen Broderick, whose dead pan conceals one of the most devastating senses of humor in Hollywood. Some of the stories she tells about the strange happenings on movie sets are gems. No respecter of personalities, Miss Broderick is never malicious, but she is never fooled.

A still taken in the days when she played duenna to Ginger Rogers in those Astaire-Rogers musicals is one of her most prized possessions.

"You know, both Ginger and Fred were allowed to retouch their own photographs," Helen related. "Most of the big stars have a wonderful time going over their stills, marking them with grease pencils to show where they want lines taken out.

"Well, a magazine wanted an informal picture of me with Astaire and Rogers, and we posed for it. I didn't get to see the proofs, not being a big star, but both of the others got out their red pencils and had a wonderful time. When the pictures came back, I was delighted. I looked about twenty-five, and Ginger and Fred were teen age kids. But first Ginger objected, then Fred. Out came the red pencils, and back the pictures went to the still gallery. The next time I saw them I nearly fainted. Astaire and Rogers were now about twelve—and since the retouchers had worked on me along with the others, I was a sort of Lana Turner effect of eighteen. Oh, it's a lovely still. I look at it for hours."

Many a studio photographer has cursed the day when a movie star was first allowed to "okay" a photograph. It has led to headaches by the score . . . because the stars have their own ideas, even as you and I, as to what they really look like. Vivien Leigh, for example, will not approve a picture showing her smiling. Although a photographer once prevailed upon her to pose for a whole series of smiling shots (I saw them and they were delightful) she would not allow them to be released for publication. And Claudette Colbert, for some odd reason, always turns her left cheek to the still camera. She just doesn't like the right side of her face, although most of us know that Claudette is a dish upside-down, sideways, or backwards.

On the reverse side of the ledger, there are the previously mentioned Miss Davis and Sheridan, who don't give a hoot what they look like, as long as the pictures have life and action.

Rita Hayworth also belongs in this category. She has many of the same qualities of Ann Sheridan, only more subdued. Rita is a genuinely sweet person, always thoughtful and considerate. She is also one of the two stars who have actually thanked me for a story after seeing it in print.

My most embarrassing moment as a Hollywood interviewer came during a cocktail party several years ago. Quite a number of movie players were present, among the late arrivals being Jane Wyman and her husband, Ronald Reagan. Remembering what a cute trick Jane Wyman was on the screen, I was rather startled at her appearance. She was, quite frankly, on the plump side, and a short silver fox jacket didn't help any. I turned to someone on my right and said rather peevishly. "That girl certainly has let herself go!"

Unfortunately it was one of Miss Wyman's best friends who answered ever so sweetly, "Jane is expecting a baby next week."

After that, I kept my big mouth shut.

LANA TURNER

my friends is the act of a very wise wife. She makes me feel that my likes and dislikes are important to her.

I say this is wise, because experience, as married happiness experts are constantly telling us, shows that a husband and wife are happiest when they manage to make each other feel important. I don't mean for a moment that people who are married should lose their independence or their individualities. But I do think they must become interdependent—drawing from each other, and contributing to each other. Before I would consider a business opportunity or buy a pair of shoes, I talk it over with Lana; and she takes me into her confidence on everything, too. Before she starts a picture or a broadcast, she asks my opinion. I may have only a limited knowledge of the subject at hand, but—it's the principle of the thing; we are husband and wife, and we share our concerns and problems.

One thing for which I am grateful is that we enjoy the same things. We both love to dance; we like golf, tennis, and of course—picture shows. We don't like crowds, and we don't go to big restaurants. We like to go places, but don't care much for long trips.

A question I know you'd like to ask is, are we jealous of each other? If you love a person enough, you can't help but have a deep fear of losing them—just as you have a deep natural fear of losing your life. Yes, we are very much concerned over each other, but, trusting each other, we laugh at the little streaks of normal jealousy we sometimes see in ourselves. If you have enough mutual interests—as we have—jealousy never gets a chance to grow into anything unpleasant.

One mutual interest is outdoor life. My wife is really an athletic girl which, I imagine, will be a surprise to many. She is a good swimmer, and she is a wonderful shot, too. We used to do quite a bit of skeet-shooting and trapshooting. When it comes to bowling, I leave well enough alone. It's one sport at which she can beat me.

We both like to read. At home we spend a lot of time with books and magazines, or we play records, or talk. We both love our home, and spend a lot of time together. Of course, much of our conversation is about our baby, and one of our games is finding resemblances to each other in the baby's features. Lana thinks she has my eyes and brow, and I think she has Lana's nose, chin and facial contours. The thing is, she seems to change a little every day.

Motherhood has changed Lana somewhat—caused her to grow up a little more, it seems to me, mentally and spiritually. She is quieter than she used to be. Probably what I am trying to say is that she has found a pattern she wants to follow, a way of life that is satisfying and pleasing to her as a woman. If Lana ever quits the screen, she will already have established herself in the greater role of motherhood and homemaker. She loves domesticity, and is a born homemaker. She is clever with a needle. And I am not surprised that she once wanted to be a designer. She can bring home a hat, rip it up, put it together again in a way that would make Lily Dache envious. She can alter a dress and make it into something entirely different. Of course, such things always seem like magic to a man, but I've heard women say Lana is good at these things, so you don't need to take my word for it. You might think I'm prejudiced.

Blondes have been the subject of a lot of kidding for about ten years, but I want to say that I am glad Lana is blonde and that she wears her hair long. I fell in love with her as a blonde, and I'd like her to stay a blonde.

"If you like my hair that way," she says, "darling, that's the way it will remain."

Of course, if she ever wanted to change it, she could probably talk me into seeing her way. In fact, I'll bet she could. You see, it is these endearing qualities in her that, to me, make Lana what she is.

UNIFORMED HITCH-HIKING IN HOLLYWOOD

A switch on that "if-I-could-only-meet-Claudette Colbert-Rita Hayworth-Lucille Ball-Linda Darnell-" dream of all lads in uniform, is told by dead-pan Virginia O'Brien. Virginia picked up a hitch-hiking soldier on her way to play a show at a nearby Army camp. The soldier belonged at that particular camp. He was tremendously grateful and excited — but he confessed that he couldn't go to the show. He was late and would undoubtedly be given k.p. duty.

Sure enough, he was. But Virginia, who has a soft place in her heart for service men, didn't forget the boy. After she was through with the show, she went searching for him. She found him in the kitchen, as he predicted, at k.p. with five other sad youths. None of them had seen the show.

Virginia told them to cheer up. Without an accompanist, she launched into one of her dead-pan songs. The boys loved it. She gave them an encore. They applauded her until the top kick arrived to see what all the row was about. He came to bawl the men out, but stayed to cheer Virginia.

When she was ready to leave, the boy she picked up turned to the other boys and shouted: "All right now, men, three cheers for Ethel Merman!"
